Hăr'rĭ-sŏn, (BENJAMIN,) born at Berkeley, on the James River, Virginia, about 1740, was the father of President William H. Harrison. In 1764 he was a member of the Virginia legislature, and in 1774 was elected to the national Congress, in which he was distinguished for his patriotic services and signed the Declaration of Independence. From 1782 to 1784 he was Governor of Virginia. He was also a member of the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States in 1788. Died in 1791.

Harrison, (BENJAMIN,) an American statesman, the great-grandson of the preceding, and grandson of General William Henry Harrison, the ninth President of the United States, was born at North Bend, Ohio, August 20, 1833. He graduated at Miami University, Oxford, in 1852, and in 1854 engaged in the practice of law in Indianapolis, that city becoming his future home. During the civil war, as colonel of the Seventieth Indiana Regiment, he served in the Army of the Cumberland, participated in the capture of Atlanta, and was made brigadier-general. In 1876 he ran for governor of Indiana, but failed of an election, and in 1880 was chosen to the United States Senate. In 1888 he became the Republican candidate for the Presidency, to which he was elected by a majority of 65 electoral votes over Cleveland. In 1892 he failed of a re-election, the vote being for Cleveland 277, for Harrison 145, for Weaver 22.

Harrison, (FREDERIC,) an English positivist, born in London, October 18, 1831. He graduated with honours at Wadham College, Oxford, in 1853, when he became a Fellow and tutor of his college. He came to the bar in 1858. In 1877 he was made professor of jurisprudence and international law under the Council of Legal Education. He has given much labour and time to the cause of education for working men and women. He has published "Order and Progress," (1875,) "Social Statics," (1875, a translation from Comte,) "Pantheism and Cosmic Evolution," etc.

Hăr'rĭ-sŏn, (JOHN,) an English mechanician, born at Faulby, in Yorkshire, in 1693, learned the trade of a carpenter. He became interested in the mechanism of clocks, in which he made several improvements, the greatest of which was the compound pendulum. Large rewards having been offered to any one who would ascertain the longitude within sixty miles, Harrison, in 1735, exhibited his chronometer to the Royal Society, and a man-of-war was put at his disposal, in which he made a voyage to Lisbon and corrected the reckoning a degree and a half. After repeated trials, he perfected in 1761 a chronometer which determined the longitude within eighteen miles, by which he became entitled to the reward of £20,000 offered by government. After it had been tested in several voyages, and it was found that other persons could construct the instrument, the above premium was paid to Harrison in 1765–67. Died in 1776.

Harrison, (THOMAS,) (given erroneously in almost all biographical dictionaries as JOHN Harrison,) an English republican general, served in the parliamentary army in the civil war, and was one of the judges of the court in which Charles I. was tried in 1649. He had obtained the rank of major-general, when he became a member of the council of state, in 1653. Cromwell, when Protector, endeavoured to gain his support by the offer of an exalted position; but he refused to co-operate with the "usurper," as he called him. In 1657 he was deprived of his commission and confined. In 1660 he was executed for his share in the death of Charles I. Before the judges who tried him, he spoke with courage and complacency of the act for which he was about to suffer.

Harrison, (THOMAS,) an English architect, often called HARRISON OF CHESTER, was born at Richmond, Yorkshire, in 1744. He studied at Rome several years, and received there a gold and a silver medal for certain designs. After his return home he resided in Chester, where he built the county courts, and a fine bridge over the Dee. He was also the architect of the Athenæum in Liverpool, of the Exchange and theatre in Manchester, and of other public buildings. Died in 1829.

Harrison, (WILLIAM,) born in London, became canon of Windsor. He wrote a "Historical Description of the Island of Britain," which contains valuable information respecting manners, customs, etc. Died about 1592.

Harrison, (WILLIAM,) an English scholar and poet, was a Fellow of New College, Oxford. He was a favourite of Swift, who described him as a "pretty fellow, with a great deal of wit, good sense, and good nature." Swift procured for him the office of secretary of embassy to the Hague. Harrison edited the fifth volume of the "Tatler." Died in 1713.

Harrison, (WILLIAM HENRY,) the ninth President of the United States, was born in Charles City county, Virginia, on the 9th of February, 1773. He was a son of Benjamin Harrison, noticed above, and was educated at Hampden-Sidney College. He entered the army in 1791, served as aide-de-camp to General Wayne in the Indian war, and became a captain in 1794. In 1797 he resigned his commission, and in 1799 he was chosen a delegate to Congress for the Northwest Territory. He was appointed Governor of the Territory of Indiana in 1801, and, having been reappointed by several successive Presidents, held that office until 1813, and made many treaties with the Indians. On the 7th of November, 1811, he defeated the Indians at Tippecanoe. He was appointed a brigadier-general in 1812, and a major-general in the regular army in 1813. In October of that year he gained a complete victory over the British at the battle of the Thames. He represented Cincinnati in Congress in 1817 and 1818, and was elected to the Senate of the United States in 1824. President Adams sent him in 1828 as minister to the republic of Colombia; but he was recalled by General Jackson in the spring of 1829. He passed many subsequent years on his farm at North Bend, on the Ohio River. In 1836 he was the Whig candidate for the Presidency of the United States, and received seventy-three electoral votes, but was defeated by Mr. Van Buren. Having been again nominated by the Whigs, he was elected in 1840 by a large majority over Van Buren, who received only sixty electoral votes out of two hundred and ninety-four, which was the whole number. This political campaign was remarkable for its immense mass-meetings, processions, and novel modes of exciting the people. He entered upon the office March 4, and died April 4, 1841.

Här'row-by, (DUDLEY RYDER,) EARL OF, an English peer and philanthropist, born about 1798. He inherited the earldom at the death of his father in 1847, and was lord privy seal in 1856 and 1857. Died in 1882.

Här'ry, BLIND, or Henry the Minstrel, a Scottish bard of the fifteenth century, who was blind from his birth, and wrote a heroic poem on the "Adventures of Sir William Wallace." But little is known of the events of his life. It appears that he made a poetical version of the popular traditions in relation to his hero, in which he followed in a humble degree the example of Homer. Some of his statements are confirmed by recent researches into the monuments and records of history. "The work, therefore," says Tytler, "cannot be treated as an entire romance."

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen."

Harsdörfer or Harsdoerfer, hars'dör'fẹr, (GEORG PHILIPP,) a German poet, born at Nuremberg in 1607, wrote in German and Latin. Among his works, which are nearly forgotten, are "The Poetical Filter," ("Poetischer Trichter," 3 vols., 1653,) and "Gesprächspiele." Died in 1658.

Hars'net, (SAMUEL,) born at Colchester, England, in 1561, became Bishop of Chichester in 1609, and Archbishop of York in 1628. He published a volume of Sermons, and a "Declaration of Popish Impostures," etc. Died in 1631.

Hart, (GEORGE VAUGHAN,) a British general, born in 1752; died in 1832.

Hart, (JAMES M.,) a landscape-painter, born at Kilmarnock, in Scotland, in 1828. He studied at Dusseldorf, and afterwards settled in New York. His "Woods in Autumn," and "Moonrise in the Adirondacks," are among his master-pieces. His brother WILLIAM, also a landscape-painter, born at Paisley about 1820, removed to the United States in 1831. Among his best works are "Peace and Plenty," a harvest scene, and "October's Golden Hours."

See TUCKERMAN, "Book of the Artists."

Hart, (JOEL T.,) an American sculptor, born in Clark county, Kentucky, in 1810. He was a mason or stonecutter in his youth. In 1849 he visited Italy, where he executed a marble statue of Henry Clay. Among his other works is "Angelina." Died March 2, 1877.

See TUCKERMAN, "Book of the Artists."

Hart, (JOHN,) one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, was the son of Edward Hart, of Hopewell, New Jersey. He was elected to Congress in 1774 by the people of New Jersey. Died in 1780.

Hart, (SOLOMON,) an eminent English historical painter, born at Plymouth in 1806. He produced in 1830 "The Elevation of the Law," (in the Jewish worship,) and was elected Royal Academician in 1840. He afterwards exhibited several pictures annually at the Academy, and treated a great variety of subjects with success. Among his works are "Richard and Saladin," (1835,) "The Interior of a Synagogue," "Milton visiting Galileo in Prison," (1847,) and "The Student preparing for Honours," (at Oxford,) (1852.) Died in 1881.

Hart, (WILLIAM,) an eminent painter, born at Paisley, Scotland, in 1823. His parents settled in Albany, New York, in 1831. His pictures of American autumn scenery are of special interest. Died June 17, 1894.

Harte, hart, (FRANCIS BRET,) a distinguished American author, born at Albany, New York, August 25, 1839. He went to California in 1854, and in 1857 found work in a newspaper office of San Francisco, at first as a printer, and finally as an editor. He was secretary of the United States mint at San Francisco, 1864–70. For a time he edited the "Overland Monthly," and then held a professorship of recent literature in the University of California. In 1878 he was appointed United States consul at Crefeld, and in 1880 at Glasgow. His books are often collections of short tales of marked originality. His principal books are "Condensed Novels," (1867,) "Poems," (1870,) "The Luck of Roaring Camp," etc., (1870,) "East and West Poems," (1871,) "Poetical Works," (1871,) "Echoes of the Foothills," (1874,) "Tales of the Argonauts," (1875,) "Gabriel Conroy," (1876,) "Two Men of Sandy Bar," (1876,) "Story of a Mine," (1878,) "Drift from Two Shores," (1878,) "In the Carquinez Woods," (1883,) etc.

Harte, hart, (WALTER,) an English poet and priest, born about 1700, was educated at Oxford, took orders, and became canon of Windsor in 1751. He wrote a poem named an "Essay on Reason," in imitation of Pope, who assisted him in its composition. He wrote also an "Essay on Painting," (in verse,) and "The History of Gustavus Adolphus," (1759.) Dr. Johnson commended him as a scholar and a man of the most companionable talents, and said, "The defects of his History [i.e. in respect to the style] proceeded not from imbecility, but from foppery." (Boswell.) His poems were once much admired. His History of Gustavus is prized in respect to the matter. Died in 1774.

See CAMPBELL, "Specimens of the British Poets."

Hartel, hâr'tẹl, (WILHELM AUGUST,) an Austrian philologist, born at Hof, in Moravia, May 29, 1839. He graduated in 1863 at the University of Vienna, in which he was called in 1869 to a professorship of Greek and Latin. His principal works are "Homeric Studies," (1871–74,) "Demosthenic Studies," (1877–78,) and various editions of classical authors.

Hartenkeil, har'tẹn-kīl', (JOHANN JAKOB,) a German medical writer, born at Mentz in 1761, settled at Salzburg. He published "The Medico-Surgical Gazette," (72 vols., 1790–1808.) Died in 1808.

Hartenstein, har'tẹn-stīn', (GUSTAV,) a German philosopher, born at Plauen, Saxony, in 1808. He wrote "The Problems and Principles of General Metaphysics," (1836,) and other treatises, and published the "Complete Works of Kant," (10 vols., 1839.) Died in 1890.

Hartig, har'tig, (FRANZ ANTON,) COUNT, a littérateur, born at Prague in 1758, wrote, in French, "Letters on France, England, and Italy," (1785,) and "Mélanges of Verse and Prose," (1788.) Died in 1797.

Hartig, har'tig, (GEORG LUDWIG,) a German writer on the culture of forests, born near Marburg in 1764. He was appointed grand master of the forests of Prussia in 1811, and published, besides other works, "The Science or Economy of Forests in all its Extent," ("Die Forstwissenschaft nach ihrem ganzen Umfange," 1831,) and a "Manual or Text-Book for Foresters," ("Lehrbuch für Förster," (3 vols., 9th edition, 1851.) Died in 1836.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Hartig, (THEODOR,) a German botanist and writer on the culture of forests, was a son of the preceding. He published a "Treatise on Botany and its Application to the Science of Forests," (1840–51,) and other works. Died March 26, 1880.

Har'ting-ton, (SPENCER COMPTON CAVENDISH,) MARQUIS OF, an English minister of state, and the eldest son of the Duke of Devonshire, was born in 1833. He graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1854, was elected to Parliament as a Liberal in 1857, and became under-secretary of war in April, 1863. He was secretary of war from February to July, 1866, and was appointed postmaster-general by Mr. Gladstone in December, 1868. In 1880 he was made secretary for India, and in 1882 war secretary.

Hartleben, hart'lā-bẹn, (FRANZ JOSEPH,) a German jurist, born at Dusseldorf in 1740; died in 1808.

Hartleben, (THEODOR KONRAD,) a German jurist, a son of the preceding, was born in 1770. From 1816 to 1827 he published a valuable legal review, "Deutsche Justiz- und Polizeifama." Among his works is a "Method or System of German Public Law," (1800.) Died in 1827.

See ERSCH und GRUBER, "Allgemeine Encyklopaedie."

Hart'ley, (DAVID,) an eminent English physician and philosopher, born at Armley, in Yorkshire, in 1705, was educated at Cambridge University. He practised medicine at Newark, London, and Bath. His reputation as an author is founded on an excellent metaphysical work, entitled "Observations on Man: his Frame, his Duty, and his Expectations," (1748.) The design of this work is to investigate the principles of association in application to the phenomena of mind. "Hartley," says Dr. Parr, "has explained the principle of association more accurately and applied it more usefully than even his great predecessor Locke." Dr. Priestley said "he had learned more from Hartley than from any book he had ever read, except the Bible." Died in 1757.

Hartley, (DAVID,) a son of the preceding, born in England about 1730, was educated at Oxford. He represented Hull in Parliament for many years, and distinguished himself by his opposition to the American war and to the slave-trade. About 1782 he was appointed plenipotentiary to negotiate with Dr. Franklin, at Paris, a treaty of peace between England and the United States. He wrote "Letters on the American War." Died in 1813.

Hartley, (Mrs. NOEL, née MAY Laffan,) an Irish novelist. Her tales include "Hogan, M.P.," "Flitters, Tatters, and the Counsellor," and other works, chiefly illustrating Irish life.

Hartlib, hart'lip, (SAMUEL,) a native of Poland, came to England about 1640. He was interested in the practical application of science, was noted for public spirit, and published a treatise on agriculture, for which Cromwell granted him a pension. About the year 1646 Milton addressed a "Treatise on Education" to Hartlib, who had recently founded an academy on a new system.

Hartman, hart'mân, (GEORG,) a German mathematician of Nuremberg, born in 1489, invented the bombarding staff. Died in 1564.

Hartmann, hart'mân, (ANTON THEODOR,) a German Orientalist, born at Dusseldorf in 1774. He was appointed professor of theology at Rostock in 1811. He was author of several works on the antiquities and literature of the Hebrews, among which is "Historical and Critical Researches on the Formation, Epoch, and Plan of the Five Books of Moses," (1831.) Died in 1838.

Hartmann, hart'mân, (CARL JOHAN,) a Swedish naturalist and physician, born at Gefle in 1790. He published a "Description of the Plants of Sweden and Norway," ("Handbok i Skandinaviens Flora," 1830; 6th edition, 1854.) Died in 1849.

Hartmann, (FERDINAND,) a German historical painter, born at Stuttgart in 1770.

Hartmann, (JOHANN,) a German chemist, born at Amberg, in Bavaria, in 1568. His chief work is "Praxis Chymiatrica," ("Chemico-Medical Practice," 1633,) often reprinted. Died at Cassel in 1631.

Hartmann, (JOHANN ADOLF,) a German historian, born at Münster in 1680, published a Latin "History of Hesse," (3 vols., 1741–46.) Died in 1744.

Hartmann, (JOHANN MELCHIOR,) a German Orientalist, born at Nordlingen in 1764. He published a good "Geographical and Historical Description of Egypt," (1799,) and other works. Died in 1827.

Hartmann, hart'mân, (JOHANN PETER EMIL,) a Danish composer, born at Copenhagen in 1805, furnished the music for two of Andersen's operas and for several of Oehlenschläger's dramas.

Hartmann, (MORITZ,) a popular German poet, born at Duschnik, in Bohemia, in 1821. He produced in 1845 a volume of lyrical poems, called the "Cup and Sword," ("Kelch und Schwert,") which had great success. Having been prosecuted for his liberal political opinions, he took refuge in Paris in 1846. In 1847 he published "New Poems," ("Neuere Gedichte,") and in 1848 was a prominent democratic member of the Parliament at Frankfort. He fought for the insurgents under Bem, in or near Vienna, in 1849, after which he was driven into exile and passed some years in Paris. Among his other works are "The Rhyming Chronicle of the Clerk Mauritius," a witty political satire, (1849,) "The War about the Forest," ("Der Krieg um den Wald," 1850,) and "Shadows," ("Schatten," 1851.) Died at Vienna, May 13, 1872.

Hartmann, (PHILIPP JAKOB,) a German physician, born at Stralsund in 1648, published able treatises on amber, anatomy, and physiology. Died in 1707.

Hartmann, von, fon hârt'mân, (EDUARD,) a German philosopher, born at Berlin, February 23, 1842. He entered the army in 1861, but, becoming disabled by an accident, devoted himself to philosophy. His system attempts to reconcile the theories of Schopenhauer with those of Hegel, Schelling, and Leibnitz, and has a touch of Schopenhauer's pessimism. Among his works are "Das Ding an sich und seine Beschaffenheit," ("The Thing in Itself, and its Constitution," 1871,) and "Die Philosophie des Unbewussten," ("The Philosophy of the Unconscious," 1869.) This work has given him a high place as an original thinker.

Hartmann von Aue, hart'mân fon ŏw'ẹh, a celebrated German minnesinger, born about 1170. Editions of his principal works have been published by Müller, Lachmann, and others.

See GERVINUS, "Deutsche National-Literatur."

Harts'horne, (Rev. CHARLES HENRY,) an English antiquary, born about 1802, became rector of Holdenby, in Northamptonshire. He published "The Book Rarities in the University of Cambridge," (1829,) "Salopia Antiqua," (1841,) and other works. Died in 1865.

Harts'horne, (JOSEPH,) M.D., an eminent physician of Philadelphia, was born at Alexandria, Virginia, December 12, 1779. His father was a native of New Jersey, his mother of Philadelphia. When only five years old, he was, while under the influence of calomel, exposed to cold, which resulted in incurable lameness. His inability to engage in the sports of boyhood led him at an early age to seek the companionship of books, and to cultivate his mind, which was endowed with powers of no common order. While attending lectures at the University of Pennsylvania, he performed the duties of apothecary and resident surgeon in the Pennsylvania Hospital, where he enjoyed the rare advantage of the practical instructions of Rush, Wistar, and Physick, who were at the same time physicians and surgeons at the hospital and lecturers in the university. A little before the expiration of his term of five years at the hospital, he accepted the position of surgeon and supercargo on an East India merchantman. In the two trips to India which he made in this capacity, he acquired a practical acquaintance with many of the diseases of tropical climates. On his return from the East he devoted himself assiduously and faithfully to the duties of his profession, in which he gradually rose to the very highest rank. Among the many distinguished physicians and surgeons that Philadelphia has produced, in sagacity and sound judgment, as well as in a thorough acquaintance with all the resources of his art, he has had few equals, and probably no superior. During the latter period of his life he was very extensively employed as a consulting physician. He died the 20th of August, 1850. Dr. Hartshorne was a firm and devout believer in the great truths of Christianity, and his moral and religious convictions went hand in hand. One who knew him well said of him, "He was the most scrupulously truthful man I ever knew. On whatever subject he spoke, it never occurred to his auditor that an idea or word could be at variance with his real opinion or inconsistent with the fact as he understood it."—Of his sons, Dr. EDWARD HARTSHORNE attained a high reputation both as physician and surgeon, and wrote ably on medical jurisprudence, surgery, and other subjects. He died June 22, 1885. HENRY, another son, formerly a successful practitioner and medical writer, was a professor of hygiene in the University of Pennsylvania, and of organic science and philosophy at Haverford College.

Hartsoeker, hart'soo'ker, (NIKLAAS,) a Dutch natural philosopher and optician, born at Gouda in March, 1656. In his childhood he was interested in astronomy, which he studied furtively at night in his own apartment. Having observed the spherical form produced accidentally by fusing a glass filament in a flame, he obtained in this way a powerful microscope, and discovered animalcules in animal fluids. While a student at Leyden, about 1676, he was encouraged in his favourite inquiries by Huyghens, who introduced him to Cassini in Paris. There he constructed a telescope equal or superior to any then in use. In 1694 he published in Paris his "Essay on Dioptrics," ("Essai de Dioptrique,") which contains, besides the principles of that science, novel and ingenious theories on the properties of bodies. He developed his system more fully in "Principles of Physics," ("Principes de Physique," 1696.) He lived in Holland from 1696 to 1704. About 1700 he taught mathematics to Peter the Great, who invited him to Russia; but he did not accept the invitation. In 1704 he was chosen professor of mathematics and philosophy in Dusseldorf. Prompted by a love of controversy, he published in 1722 an attack on the system of Newton and another on the theories of Leibnitz. Died in 1725.

Hart'stēne, (HENRY J.,) an American naval officer, born in South Carolina, was sent by the United States government in 1855 to the Arctic regions in search of Dr. E. K. Kane and his party, whom he rescued. (See KANE.) Died in 1868.

Hart'suff, (GEORGE L.,) an American general, born in the State of New York about 1830, graduated at West Point in 1852. He was appointed a brigadier-general in the spring of 1862, and was wounded at the battle of Antietam, September 17 of that year. This wound disabled him for active service. Died May 16, 1874.

Hartzenbusch, harts'ẹn-boosh', (JUAN EUGENIO,) a Spanish dramatic poet, of German extraction, born in Madrid in 1806. In 1836 he produced "The Lovers of Teruel," a successful drama. Among his works, which are admired for a vivid imagination and an energetic style, are "The Visionary," a comedy, (1840,) "Honoria," (1842,) and "Primero Yo," a drama, (1842.) Died 1880.

Hartzheim, harts'hīm, (JOSEPH,) a learned German Jesuit and historian, born at Cologne in 1694, was professor of philosophy and theology in his native city. He wrote a valuable collection entitled "Bibliotheca Coloniensis," (1747,) containing notices of the lives and writings of authors who lived in the diocese of Cologne, and edited five volumes of the "Councils of Germany," ("Concilia Germaniæ," 1759–63.) Died in 1763.

Hartzoeker, hart'soo'ker, (THEODORUS,) a skilful Dutch painter, born at Utrecht in 1696; died in 1740.

Har'vard, (JOHN,) an English nonconformist divine, born in 1607, graduated at Cambridge University in 1631. After having been ordained, he emigrated to Massachusetts, and officiated a short time at Charlestown. At his death he left a legacy of £779 to endow a school at Cambridge, and thus became memorable as the founder of the university which bears his name. Died in 1638. One hundred and ninety years after his death, a granite monument was erected over his grave in Charlestown.

Har'vey, (Sir ELIAB,) an English admiral, a descendant of the celebrated Dr. William Harvey, born in 1759, entered the navy in 1771. During the French Revolution he served as captain in the West Indies and in the Channel fleet. In 1805 he distinguished himself at Trafalgar, and was raised to the rank of rear-admiral the same year. He became vice-admiral in 1810, and full admiral in 1819. In 1825 he was made a G.C.B. He was elected to Parliament in 1780, and again in 1806. Died in 1830, aged about seventy.

Harvey, (GABRIEL,) LL.D., an English lawyer and poet, born about 1545, was a Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and practised law in London. He was an intimate friend of the poet Spenser, and author of an admired poem entitled "Hobbinol," prefixed to the "Fairy Queen." He published several letters and orations in English and Latin. Died about 1630.

Har'vey, (GEORGE,) a popular Scottish painter, born near Stirling in 1806. He became a member of the Scottish Academy about 1828, and devoted his talents to the illustration of the national character, scenery, and history of Scotland. Among his works are "Covenanters Preaching," (1830,) "The Battle of Drumclog," (1836,) "A Highland Funeral," (1844,) "Glen Enterkin," (1846,) "The Past and Present," (1848,) and "The Bowlers," (1850.) He is regarded as one of the leading masters of the Scottish school. Died January 22, 1876.

Harvey, (GIDEON,) an English physician and writer, born in Surrey, was the medical attendant of Charles II. in his exile, and was subsequently physician to William III., and to the Tower of London. Died in 1700.

Harvey, (WILLIAM,) an English anatomist, celebrated for his discovery of the circulation of the blood, was born at Folkestone, Kent, in April, 1578. He entered Caius College, Cambridge, in 1593, and graduated in 1597, after which he studied medicine and anatomy under Fabricius ab Acquapendente at Padua. He returned home about 1602, married a lady named Browne and commenced the practice of medicine in London. In 1609 he was appointed physician to Saint Bartholomew's Hospital. He was chosen by the College of Physicians in 1615 to deliver lectures on anatomy and surgery, and soon after that date made the important discovery of the circulation of the blood, which he taught in London in 1619, but which was not published until 1628. In this year he produced "Essays on the Motion of the Heart and the Blood," ("Exercitationes de Motu Cordis et Sanguinis.") His new theory was generally rejected by the physicians of his time, and was so unpopular that he complained that his practice declined after the publication of the treatise above mentioned. Parisanus, Riolanus, and others wrote against Dr. Harvey on this subject; but, after the truth of his doctrine was generally recognized, attempts were made to deprive him of the honour of the discovery. He became physician to Charles I. about 1630, and attended him during the civil war which began about 1642. This service caused him to neglect his duties at Saint Bartholomew's Hospital. In the latter part of the civil war a party of soldiers plundered his house and burned some valuable manuscripts. He gave much attention to the subject of generation, and published a work "De Generatione Animalium," (1651,) in which he maintained that every animal is produced from an egg. He was elected president of the College of Physicians in 1654; but he declined, on account of his advanced age. He died in June, 1657. An edition of his Works was published by the College of Physicians, in 2 vols., 1666.

"Harvey is entitled," says Hume, "to the glory of having made, by reasoning alone, without any mixture of accident, a capital discovery in one of the most important branches of science. He had also the happiness of establishing at once this theory on the most solid and convincing proofs." ("History of England," chap. lxii.) "It is manifest," says Hallam, "that several anatomists of the sixteenth century were on the verge of completely detecting the law by which the motion of the blood is governed. . . . It may, indeed, be thought wonderful that Servetus, Columbus, or Cæsalpin should not have more distinctly apprehended the consequences of what they maintained; . . . but the defectiveness of their views is not to be alleged as a counter-balance to the more steady sagacity of Harvey" ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe," vol. ii.

See DR. LAWRENCE, "Life of William Harvey," prefixed to the edition of his Works above mentioned, 1660; "Lives of British Physicians," London, 1857.

Harvey, (WILLIAM,) an English artist, born at Newcastle-on-Tyne about 1796, was a pupil of the famous engraver Bewick. He settled in London at an early age, and became distinguished as a designer for engravings on wood. His skill was displayed in the illustration of various works, among which are "The Zoological Gardens," "The Pilgrim's Progress," and "The Arabian Nights' Entertainments." He died January 13, 1866.

Harvey, (WILLIAM HENRY,) professor of botany in the University of Dublin, was born at Limerick in 1811. He published a "History of British Sea-Weeds," (3 vols., 1846–51,) a work of high character, "Nereis Australis; or, Illustrations of the Algæ of the Southern Ocean," (1848,) "The Sea-Side Book," (3d edition, 1854,) and "Flora Capensis," (3 vols., 1865.) He explored the coasts of Australia and the South Sea islands in 1853–55, and obtained the chair of botany in Dublin in 1856. Died in May, 1866.

See ASA GRAY, "Notice of W. H. Harvey," in "Silliman's Journal," republished in the "Report of the Smithsonian Institution" for 1867.

Har'wood, (Sir BUSIC,) an English anatomist, born at Newmarket about 1745. He became professor of anatomy at Cambridge in 1785, and published lectures on that science. Died in 1814.

Harwood, (EDWARD,) an English Unitarian minister, born in Lancashire in 1729. He had charge of a congregation in Bristol from 1765 to 1770, after which he lived in London. He excelled as a classical and biblical scholar, and published numerous able works, of which the most important are "An Introduction to the Study of the New Testament," (1767,) a "View of the Various Editions of the Greek and Roman Classics," (1775,) "An Edition of the Greek Testament, with English Notes," (1776,) and "Biographia Classica," (new edition, 2 vols., 1778.) Died in 1794.

Hăs'dru-bal or As'dru-bal, [Gr. Ἀσδρούβας,] a distinguished Carthaginian general and a popular leader of the democratic party, was a son-in-law of Hamilcar Barca, with whom he went to Spain in 238 B.C. After the death of Hamilcar Barca, 229 B.C., he obtained the chief command in Spain. He founded the city of New Carthage, (Carthagena,) which became one of the richest in the world, and greatly extended the power of Carthage in Spain, partly by his victories in battle and partly by his political talents. He made a treaty with the Romans, stipulating that the river Ebro should be the boundary between the two nations. He was assassinated by a slave in Spain in 221 B.C.

Hasdrubal or Asdrubal, a son of Gisco, was a general of the second Punic war. He entered Spain with an army in 214 B.C., and shared with Mago the chief command in that country after the other Hasdrubal marched to Italy, 207 B.C. They were defeated in a decisive battle at Silpia or Elinga, by Scipio, in 206. In 204 he was general-in-chief of a large army raised to oppose Scipio, who had invaded Africa. His camp near Utica was fired by the Romans, and nearly all his army, it is said, perished in the flames or by the sword.

Hasdrubal or Asdrubal, an able Carthaginian general, and brother of the great Hannibal, commanded in Spain in the second Punic war, in 218 B.C., while Hannibal crossed the Alps and invaded Italy. He maintained the war against the Romans under Publius and Cneius Scipio with various success until 212, when he gained a complete victory, in which both the Scipios were killed. Five years later, he marched across the Alps to reinforce his brother in Italy; but before he could effect this design he was attacked by the Romans at the river Metaurus, defeated, and killed, in 207 B.C. His head was cut off and thrown into the camp of Hannibal. The Roman writers represent him as a very able commander.

Hasdrubal or Asdrubal, a Carthaginian officer, who served under Hannibal in Italy. He contributed greatly to the victory of Cannæ, (216 B.C.,) where he commanded the left wing and completed the rout of the enemy by a cavalry charge on their rear.

Hasdrubal or Asdrubal, an able Carthaginian general, who had the chief command in the third Punic war. He defeated the consul Manilius at Nepheris about 148 B.C., and obstinately defended Carthage against the besieging army of Scipio Africanus in 146 B.C., and assumed despotic power in that city. He finally surrendered to Scipio, who spared his life, the remainder of which he passed in captivity.

Hase, hä'zẹh, (HEINRICH,) a German antiquary, born at Altenburg in 1789, published a "Treatise on Greek Antiquities," (1828,) and other works. Died in 1842.

Hase, (KARL AUGUST,) an eminent German theologian, born at Steinbach, Saxony, in 1800. He became professor of theology at Jena about 1830. He endeavoured to reconcile the Lutheran faith with the progress of modern science, in his "Evangelical Dogmatics," (1823,) and his work called "Gnosis," (3 vols., 1828.) He wrote other able works, among which is a "History of the Church," ("Kirchengeschichte," 1834; 6th edition, 1848,) which, by avoiding all sectarian partiality, has obtained general favour. Died January 3, 1890.

Hase, (KARL BENEDICT,) an eminent Hellenist, born near Naumburg, in Prussian Saxony, in 1780. He became professor of Greek palæography and modern Greek in Paris in 1816. He was admitted into the Academy of Inscriptions about 1824. He published, besides other works, an edition of Leo Diaconus, (1819.) Died 1864.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Hase, von, fon hä'zẹh, (THEODOR,) a German Lutheran divine, born at Bremen in 1682. He wrote "Critical Dissertations." Died in 1731.

Hasenclever, hä'zẹn-klä'vẹr, (JOHANN PETER,) an excellent German painter of genre, born at Remscheid, Prussia, in 1810, was a pupil of Schadow, of Dusseldorf. He worked at the latter city, and gained much popularity by his humorous productions, among which are "The Return of Job from College," and other pictures, the subjects of which are derived from the "Jobsiad," a comic poem. He was a member of the Academy of Fine Arts, Berlin. Died in 1853.

Hasenclever, (PETER,) a German merchant and manufacturer, distinguished by the magnitude of his operations and his influence on the commerce and industry of two continents, was born at Remscheid, Prussia, in 1716. He made improvements in the fabrication of iron and of woollen stuffs. About 1763 he formed in London a company, and became director of a great industrial enterprise in New York and New Jersey, where they worked mines of iron and prepared that metal for use. He settled at Landshut, in Silesia, in 1775, where he carried on an extensive linen-trade. Died in 1793.

Has'sard, (JOHN R. G.,) LL.D., an American author, born in the city of New York in 1836. He graduated in 1855 at the Catholic college of Fordham, New York, and was for many years a prominent journalist of New York city. He wrote a "Life of Archbishop Hughes," (1866,) a "History of the United States," a "Life of Pius IX.," "Essays," etc. Died April 18, 1888.

Hasse, hȧs'ṣĕ, (FRIEDRICH CHRISTIAN AUGUST,) a German historical writer, born at Rehfeld, near Herzberg, in 1773. He became professor in the Cadettenhaus of Dresden in 1798, and obtained a chair of history at Leipsic in 1828. He wrote a "History of Lombardy," (4 vols., 1828,) and other works, and was one of the editors of the "Conversations-Lexikon" published by Brockhaus. Died in 1848.

Hasse, (JOHANN ADOLF,) a celebrated German composer, born at Bergedorf, near Hamburg, in March, 1699. He was called by the Italians IL SASSONE, ("the Saxon.") He went to Italy about 1724, and became a pupil of A. Scarlatti at Naples. There he produced in 1726 the opera "Il Sesostrate," by which he gained a high reputation. His "Miserere" (1727) is called a master-piece of sacred music. He afterwards lived in Venice, Dresden, London, and Vienna, and composed the operas of "Artaserse," "Arminio," (1745,) etc. Died in 1783. The words of his operas were composed by Metastasio.

Hasse, (KARL EWALD,) a physician, and a son of Friedrich Christian August, noticed above, was born at Dresden in 1810. He published "A Description of the Diseases of the Organs of Circulation and Respiration," (1841,) which he announced as the first volume of a large work on pathological anatomy. He was chosen professor of pathology at Heidelberg in 1852, and professor of the same at Göttingen in 1856.

Hassel, hȧs'ṣĕl, (JOHANN GEORG HEINRICH,) a German statistician, born at Wolfenbüttel in 1770. He became director of the bureau of statistics of Westphalia in 1809. He published, besides other works, "Text-Book (Lehrbuch) of the Statistics of the European States," (1812,) a "Complete Manual of Modern Geography and Statistics," (1816–20,) and a "General Geographical Dictionary," (2 vols., 1818.) He lived mostly at Weimar after 1814, and was one of the editors of Ersch and Gruber's "Encyclopædia." Died in 1829.

See BROCKHAUS, "Conversations-Lexikon."

Hasselquist, hȧs'ṣĕl-kwist', (FREDRIK,) a Swedish naturalist, born at Törnvalla in 1722, was one of the most eminent pupils of Linnæus, under whom he studied at Upsal. In 1747 he wrote an able thesis on the "Virtues of Plants." Having heard Linnæus express a wish that some naturalist would explore Palestine, in order to develop its natural history, then but little known, he prepared himself for the journey, and embarked in 1749. He explored Egypt, Arabia, and Palestine, and was about to return, with a rich collection of plants, minerals, fishes, insects, etc., when he died at Smyrna in 1752. His valuable journal, observations, and descriptions were published by Linnæus in Swedish, with the title of "Iter Palæstinum; or, A Tour through Palestine, with Memoirs and Remarks on Objects of Natural History," (2 vols., 1757,) which is an excellent scientific work.

Hassencamp, hȧs'ṣĕn-kȧmp', (JOHANN MATTHÄUS,) a German Orientalist, born at Marburg in 1743, published a "Commentary on the Pentateuch," (1765,) and "Annals of Theological Literature," (1789–96.) Died in 1797.

Hassenfratz, ȧ'sôN'frȧts', (JEAN HENRI,) a French chemist, born in Paris in 1755. He was director or foreman of Lavoisier's laboratory about 1785, and was an active Jacobin in the Revolution. In 1797 he became tutor of physics in the École Polytechnique. He wrote, besides other works, "Cours de Physique céleste," (1803,) and "The Art of Smelting Iron-Ore," (4 vols., 1812.) Died in 1827.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Hassenpflug, hȧs'ṣĕn-pflo͝og', (HANS DANIEL LUDWIG FRIEDRICH,) a German politician, born at Hanau in 1793. Having shown himself a partisan of absolutism, he was appointed minister of justice and the interior at the court of Hesse-Cassel in 1832. He became very unpopular, and in 1837 went into exile. In 1841 he obtained a seat in the superior court (Obertribunal) of Berlin. He was recalled to Cassel in 1850 as prime minister, and renewed his arbitrary acts, which provoked a popular revolt in 1855. The Elector was forced to fly from his capital, and his minister resigned. Died in October, 1862.

See BROCKHAUS, "Conversations-Lexikon."

Hassenstein, hȧs'ṣĕn-stīn', (BOGISLAUS,) Baron von Lobkowitz, (lop-ko'v̂its',) a Bohemian poet and nobleman, was a liberal patron of letters. He wrote a volume of Latin poems, called "Farrago Poematum," (1570.) He was secretary of state of Hungary. Died in 1510.

Hassoun, hȧs-soon', (ANTONIUS,) a cardinal, born at Constantinople, June 13, 1809, was created a cardinal-priest in 1880; died in 1884.

Has'tẹd, (EDWARD,) an English antiquary, born at Hawley, Kent, in 1732. He published a valuable "History and Topographical Survey of the County of Kent," (4 vols., 1788–99.) Died in 1812.

Hās'ting or Hās'tings, a daring and successful adventurer or sea-king, is supposed to have been a Dane or Norman by birth. In the reign of Charles the Bald he ravaged the western coast of France with his piratical crew. He ascended the Loire in 867, attacked Anjou and Poitou, and captured Angers. In 894, with a large fleet and an army of Northmen, he invaded England, and, after many fierce conflicts, he was defeated by Alfred, and driven out of the island, in 896 A.D.

See DEPPING, "Histoire des Expéditions maritimes des Normands."

Hās'tings, (Lady ELIZABETH,) born in England in 1682, was the daughter of Theophilus Hastings, Earl of Huntingdon, and sister-in-law of the well-known Lady Huntingdon. She built churches, established schools, and was eminent for piety and benevolence. Died in 1739.

See THOMAS BERNARD, "Life of Lady E. Hastings."

Hastings, (Lady FLORA,) daughter of the Marquis of Hastings, was born in 1806, and became lady of the bed-chamber to the Duchess of Kent. She was an excellent scholar, and author of a number of graceful poetical effusions, among which are "The Rainbow" and "The Cross of Constantine." Died in 1839.

Hastings, (FRANCIS RAWDON,) Marquis of Hastings, the eldest son of the Earl of Moira, was born in 1754. He took part in the battle of Bunker Hill in 1775, and became adjutant-general in 1778. In 1781 he defeated the Americans at Camden, South Carolina. In 1783 he was raised to the peerage, as Baron Rawdon, and in 1793 succeeded his father as Earl of Moira. He fought as major-general against the French in Flanders in 1794. On the formation of a Whig ministry in 1806, he was named master-general of the ordnance. From 1813 to 1823 he held the office of Governor-General of India, and maintained war against the Mahrattas and Goorkas. His administration, on the whole, was accounted prosperous, and his policy liberal. In 1816 he was created Viscount Loudoun, Earl of Rawdon, and Marquis of Hastings. In 1824 he was appointed Governor of Malta. Died in 1826.

Hastings, (SELINA.) See HUNTINGDON, COUNTESS OF.

Hastings, (WARREN,) the first Governor-General of British India, was born in Worcestershire in 1732. His father, Pynaston, was the son of the rector of Daylesford, who belonged to a noble and once wealthy family. Warren was educated at Westminster, where he formed an intimacy with the poet Cowper, his fellow-student. In 1750 he obtained a clerkship at Calcutta in the service of the East India Company. A few years afterwards, he was selected to negotiate with the native princes, because, in addition to his other qualifications, he was master of the Persian and Hindostanee languages, which few Englishmen at that time could speak. He served as a member of the Council of Bengal from 1761 to 1764, after which he returned to England, having realized a moderate fortune, which was soon dissipated by his liberality or imprudence.

After a repose of four years, he again offered his services to the directors, who appointed him a member of the Council at Madras, where he managed affairs with such ability and success that in 1772 he was made president of the Council of Bengal. In 1773, by an act of Parliament, the control of all British India was given to the Council of Bengal, consisting of four members besides the president, who now obtained the title of governor-general and a large accession of power, except in the contingency that a majority of the council should oppose his measures,—which presently occurred. Sir Philip Francis, combining with two other members, obtained for about two years the chief control, and thwarted the policy of the governor. When the account of Hastings's cruelty and ambition in respect to the Rohilla war, etc. reached England, the directors condemned his conduct; and, as his agent in London had presented to them a conditional resignation received from Hastings, they gladly accepted it, and appointed Mr. Wheler to succeed him. But in the mean time one of his opponents in the council had died, and the governor, having the casting vote, was again absolute. He asserted that he had not resigned; and, with the sanction of the supreme court, (who pronounced his resignation invalid,) and with the popular feeling in his favour, he was able to keep the office.

In 1780, Hastings having said in the council that the conduct of Francis was void of truth and honour, the latter challenged him, and in the exchange of shots was severely wounded. Soon after this, the governor had to contend against Hyder Ali, the King of Mysore, who invaded the Carnatic with 90,000 men, (led by French officers,) defeated several detachments of English, captured their forts, and threatened to subvert their empire. By the prompt, energetic, and politic measures of Hastings the government passed safely through this crisis, and the ambitious designs of Hyder Ali were blasted by the British victory at Porto Novo.

To supply the deficit in the treasury occasioned by this war, he resorted to those violent and unscrupulous measures which provoked his impeachment and have left a stain on his character that even his great talents and services cannot efface. He resolved to plunder Cheyte Sing, the rich Rajah of Benares. By repeated extortions he provoked him to resist, and then punished that resistance by expelling him from his dominions and confiscating his revenue. The spoliation of the Begums of Oude, under circumstances of peculiar atrocity, was another crime laid to his charge. In 1785 he resigned his office and returned to England. After two sessions had been spent in preparation for his impeachment, the case was formally opened in 1788, by Burke, Fox, and others, and terminated in his acquittal in 1795. For a full account of his trial, see Macaulay's "Essay on Warren Hastings." The company rewarded Hastings with an annuity of £4000, and lent him £50,000 without interest for eighteen years. He purchased the manor of Daylesford, the home of his ancestors, and retired from public life. A few years before his death he was admitted into the privy council, and stood high in the royal favour. Died in 1818. (For a much more favourable view of the life and character of Warren Hastings, see the article on him in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," (9th edition,) written by J. S. Cotton.)

Hat'sęll, (JOHN,) an Englishman, born at Cambridge in 1742. He was clerk of the House of Commons many years, ending about 1796. He published an important work called "Precedents of Proceedings in the House of Commons, with Observations," (1781; 4th edition, 4 vols., 1818.) Died in 1820.

Hat'tọn, (Sir CHRISTOPHER,) an English statesman and favourite courtier of Queen Elizabeth, born in 1540 at Holdenby. He was appointed lord chancellor in 1587, and, though not a lawyer by profession, he performed the duties of that office with credit. His character and capacity are represented to have been excellent. The public were much astonished when it was announced that the queen had selected for this dignity one whom Lord Campbell describes as "a gay young cavalier, never called to the bar, and chiefly famed for his handsome person, his taste in dress, and his skill in dancing." Some persons ascribe to Hatton the fourth act of "Tancred and Gismund," and several legal treatises. Died in 1591.

Hauenschild, von, fon hŏw'ẹn-shĭlt', (Richard Georg Spiller,) a German poet, whose nom de plume is Max Waldau, was born at Breslau in 1825. He published a volume of lyric poems, called "Leaves in the Wind," ("Blätter im Winde," 1848,) a novel, entitled "After Nature," ("Nach der Natur," 3 vols., 1850,) and other works. Died in 1855.

Hauff, hŏwf, (Wilhelm,) a German novelist, born at Stuttgart in 1802. He was educated at the University of Tübingen, and produced in 1826 "Lichtenstein," a historical novel, which is greatly admired. He afterwards published "The Man in the Moon," a satire, a number of popular tales, among which is "The Portrait of the Emperor," ("Das Bild des Kaisers,") and a humorous, fantastic work, called "Phantasien im Bremer Rathskeller," (1827.) He died prematurely, and much regretted, in November, 1827. Hauff belonged to the school of Hoffmann, but was inferior to him, perhaps, in richness of imagination.

Haug, (Martin,) a German Orientalist, born at Ostdorf, Würtemberg, January 30, 1827. He was educated at Tübingen and Göttingen, and in 1859 became Sanscrit professor at Poonah, and in 1868 at Munich. His writings treat of Parsee, Sanscrit, Zend, and Pehlevi subjects, and are of considerable importance. Died at Ragatz, June 3, 1876.

Hauge, hŏw'gẹh, (Hans Nielsen,) a Norwegian religious reformer, born at Thunö, April 3, 1771. He preached extensively in Norway and Denmark, and founded the "Haugian" sect or party within the Norwegian Lutheran Church. He published books and tracts the tendency of which is towards what are called evangelical or "Low-Church" views. He was imprisoned for ten years for his preaching and his writings, and died at Bredwill, March 29, 1824.

Haughton, haw'tọn, (Sir Graves Champney,) an English author, born in 1787. He was professor at the East India College, Haileybury, from 1817 to 1827. He published, besides other works, a "Bengali, Sanscrit, and English Dictionary," and "An Inquiry into the First Principles of Reasoning," (1839.) Died near Paris in 1849.

Haughton, (William,) an English dramatist in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, wrote a comedy called "Englishmen for my Money," (1616,) and was one of the authors of the comedy of "Patient Grissill," printed in 1603.

Haugwitz, von, fon hŏwg'vits, (Christian Heinrich Karl,) Count, a Prussian statesman, born near Oels, in Silesia, in 1752. He was sent as ambassador to the court of Vienna in 1790, and became minister of foreign affairs in 1792. He favoured an alliance with France, and was superseded by Hardenberg in 1804. After the success of Napoleon at Ulm, Haugwitz was recalled and sent to Vienna to treat with the victor, in November, 1805. In the ensuing December he signed a treaty of alliance with France, by which Hanover was ceded to Prussia. He was prime minister in 1806 until the battle of Jena, before which he had made efforts to preserve peace with France. His administration was unpopular. After the disastrous campaign of 1806 he was excluded from all political employment. Died in 1832.

See Minutoli, "Der Graf von Haugwitz und Job von Witzleben," 1844.

Haukâl, (Haucal or Haoucâl,) Ibn, ĭb'n hŏw-kăl', (Abool- (or Abûl-) Kâsem-Mohammed, ă'bōōl kă'sem mo-hăm'med,) called also simply Haukâl, a distinguished Arabian traveller and geographer, was born probably at Bagdâd. Departing from that city in 943 A.D., he traversed for many years the countries which lie between the Indus and the Atlantic. He wrote about 975 A.D. an important work, entitled "A Book of Roads and Kingdoms," which is furnished with maps and is considered reliable.

See Uijlenbroek, "Dissertatio de Ibn-Haukalo Geographo," 1822; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Hauks'bee or Hawks'bee, (Francis,) an English philosopher, who was made a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1705, and was one of the earliest experimenters and discoverers in electricity, which he perceived was excited by the friction of glass. In 1709 he published his "Experiments on Various Subjects, touching Light and Electricity," which was translated into Italian and French.

Haupt, hŏwpt, (Herman,) an American engineer, born in Philadelphia in 1817, graduated at West Point in 1835. He published a "General Theory of Bridge-Construction," (1853,) and before the war of 1861–65 was distinguished as a civil engineer. He was appointed a brigadier-general about August, 1862.

Haupt, (Lewis Muhlenberg,) an American engineer, born at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, March 21, 1844. He graduated at West Point Military Academy in 1867, and entered the engineer corps in the army, but resigned, and became professor of civil engineering in the University of Pennsylvania. His principal works are "Engineering Specifications and Contracts," (1878,) "Working Drawings," (1881,) and "The Topographer," (1884.)

Haupt, hŏwpt, (Moritz,) an eminent German philologist, born at Zittau, in Saxony, in 1808. He was appointed professor of German literature at Leipsic in 1843, but was removed in 1850 because he had taken part in the political movements of 1849. He edited several old German poets, and published a number of works on classical philology, among which is "Observationes criticæ," (1841.) A "Review of German Antiquities," founded and edited by him, (1841–60,) is called an excellent work. He died February 5, 1874.

Hauptmann, hŏwpt'măn, (Moritz,) a German composer, born at Dresden in 1792. He was employed in the chapel of the Elector of Hesse-Cassel from 1822 to 1842. He composed masses, sonatas for the piano and violin, an opera named "Matilda," and other works, which are admired for purity of style. He also wrote a treatise on music, "Harmonik und Metrik." Died 1868.

Hauréau, hō'rà'ō', (Barthélemy,) an eminent French author, born in Paris in 1812. He was keeper of the manuscripts of the National Library from 1848 to 1852. Among his works, which have a high reputation, are a "Literary History of Maine," (4 vols., 1843–47,) an "Essay on the Scholastic Philosophy," (2 vols., 1850, crowned by the Institute,) and "Francis I. and his Court," (1853.) He wrote articles for Didot's "Biographie Générale," which see.

Hauser, hŏw'zẹr, (Kaspar,) the celebrated Nuremberg foundling, whose mysterious history excited intense interest throughout Europe, was first observed on the 26th of May, 1828, at Nuremberg, by a citizen of that place. He was apparently about sixteen years of age, walked with difficulty, and manifested childish ignorance on the most common affairs of life. When interrogated, he replied in a few broken sentences, and presented a letter purporting to be from a Bavarian peasant, who stated that the boy had been left at his door and had been secretly maintained by him. Having been received into the house of the burgomaster Binder, it was gradually ascertained that Kaspar Hauser, as he called himself, had been kept from infancy in a dark, subterranean prison, provided with bread and water, and otherwise cared for, during his sleep, by an unknown keeper. A short time previous to his escape, however, a man had appeared who, after teaching him to write and to walk, had put him on the road to Nuremberg. He was next taken into the family of Professor Daumer, of Nuremberg, where he showed an eager desire for knowledge, and a surprising memory. While near his patron's house, he was wounded one day by a person who suddenly disappeared and evaded all search. He was soon after this taken under the protection of Lord Stanhope, who sent him to Anspach to be educated. In December, 1833, he was invited to a rendezvous with a person who promised him information of his origin, but who, while Hauser was reading a paper presented to him, inflicted upon him a wound of which he died in three days.

Hausmann, hŏwss'mân, (JOHANN FRIEDRICH LUDWIG,) a German geologist, born at Hanover in 1782. He obtained in 1811 the chair of geology and mineralogy at Göttingen. He published a "Manual of Mineralogy," (3 vols., 1813,) which is highly esteemed, a "Journey through Scandinavia," (5 vols., 1818,) and a work "On the Formation of the Hartz Mountains." Died in 1859.

Häusser or Haeusser, hois'sẹr, (LUDWIG,) a German historian, born in Alsace in 1818. Among his works, which are highly esteemed, is a "History of Germany from the Death of Frederick the Great to the Formation of the Germanic Confederation," 1855.) Died in 1867.

Haussez, d', dō'sà', (CHARLES Lemercher de Longpré—lẹh-mĕR'shà' dẹh lôN'prà',) BARON, a French minister of state, born in Normandy in 1778. He was minister of marine from August, 1829, to July, 1830. Died in 1854.

Haussmann, hōss'môN', (GEORGES EUGÈNE,) BARON, a French administrator, a grandson of Nicolas, noticed below, was born in Paris in 1809. He obtained in 1853 the important office of prefect of La Seine, (at Paris.) By a lavish expenditure of the public treasure he adorned Paris with new boulevards and other costly public works. He was made a senator in 1857. Died Jan. 12, 1891.

Haussmann, (JEAN MICHEL,) a French chemist and manufacturer, born at Colmar in 1749, made improvements in the art of dyeing or printing calico. Died in 1824.

Haussmann, (NICOLAS,) brother of the preceding, born in 1761, was an active member of the Convention, (1792–95.) Died in 1846.

Haussonville, d', do'sôN'vèl', (JOSEPH OTHENIN BERNARD de Cléron—dẹh klà'rôN',) COMTE, a French littérateur, born in 1809, was elected to the Chamber of Deputies in 1842 and in 1846. He published a "History of the Foreign Policy of the French Government from 1830 to 1848," (2 vols., 1850,) etc. Died in 1884.

Hautefeuille, hōt'fuI' or hōt'fuh'yẹ, (LAURENT BASILE,) a French jurist, distinguished as a writer on maritime law, was born in Paris in 1805. His principal works are "Législation criminelle maritime," (1839,) "Code of Maritime Fishery," (1844,) and "The Rights and Duties of Neutral Nations in Time of Maritime War," (4 vols., 1848–49.) His works have a high reputation on both sides of the Channel. Died at Paris, January 26, 1875.

Hautefeuille, de, dẹh hōt'fuI' or hōt'fuh'yẹ, (JEAN,) a French ecclesiastic and mechanician, born at Orléans in 1647. The Duchess of Bouillon patronized him and gave him a pension. Among his inventions was the spiral spring which moderates the movements of the balance of a watch, (1674.) This invention was also claimed by Huyghens. He wrote an "Essay on the Cause of the Echo," (1718,) and many treatises on mechanics, etc. Died in 1724.

Hautefort, d', dōt'fôR', (MARIE,) Duchesse de Schomberg, a favourite of Louis XIII. of France, was born in 1616. She gained the favour of the king about 1630, and became a maid of honour to the queen, Anne of Austria, with whom she maintained confidential relations. Richelieu induced the king to dismiss her from court in 1640. Died in 1691.

See "Vie de Madame d'Hautefort," anonymous; VICTOR COUSIN, "Madame d'Hautefort."

Hautemer, d', dōt'maiR', (GUILLAUME,) Comte de Grancey and Seigneur de Fervaques, (fẽR'vȧk',) a French general, born in 1538. He fought with distinction against the Spaniards at Saint-Quentin and Gravelines, (1558,) and entered the service of Henry IV., who made him a marshal of France in 1595. Died in 1613.

Hauterive, d', dōt'rèv', (ALEXANDRE MAURICE Blanc de Lanautte—blôN dẹh lȧ'nōt',) COMTE, an able French diplomatist, born at Aspres (Hautes-Alpes) in 1754. Having been ordered by Bonaparte to compose a manifesto to foreign powers, he produced in 1800 "On the State of France at the End of the Year VIII." He became the confidential secretary of the First Consul, and in 1803 was made a councillor of state. In 1807 he was appointed keeper of the archives of France. He was often consulted by the emperor on foreign affairs, and acted as minister ad interim while Champagny and Caulaincourt followed the army. Died in 1830.

See ARTAUD DE MONTOR, "Histoire de la Vie et des Travaux politiques du Comte d'Hauterive," 1839; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Haute-Serre, d', dōt'saiR', (ANTOINE Dadin—dȧ'dȧN',) a French jurisconsult, born in the diocese of Cahors, became in 1644 professor of law in Toulouse. He published learned works on the law and on the early history of France. Died in 1682.

Hautesrayes. See DESHAUTERAYES.

Hauteville, hōt'vèl', or Hanvill, de, dẹh hôN'vèl', (JEAN,) a French poet, who lived about 1150–90. He left a Latin poem, called "Archithrenius," which was once popular.

Hautpoul, d', dō'pool', (ALPHONSE HENRI,) MARQUIS, a French general, born at Versailles in 1789. He became maréchal-de-camp in 1823, and obtained the rank of lieutenant-general in 1841. In 1849 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the army of Rome, and showed himself hostile to the republican régime. He was minister of war for several months in 1849 and 1850, and was made a senator in 1852. Died July 28, 1865.

Hautpoul, d', (ANNE MARIE de Montgeroult—dẹh môN'zheh'roo',) COMTESSE, a French authoress, born in Paris in 1763, published "Sappho to Phaon," a poem, (1790,) and several novels. Died in 1837.

Hautpoul-Salette, d', dō'pool' sȧ'lĕt', (JEAN JOSEPH,) a French general, born in 1754 of a noble family in Languedoc. He became general of division under Moreau, and in 1805 distinguished himself at the battle of Austerlitz, soon after which he was made a senator. He contributed to the victory at Jena in 1806, and was killed at Eylau in February, 1807.

Haüy, hȧ'we' or hȧ'ü-e', (RENÉ JUST,) ABBÉ, a distinguished French mineralogist, born at Saint-Just, Picardy, on the 28th of February, 1743. He was educated at the College of Navarre, Paris, in which he was appointed professor of Latin in 1764. His interest in mineralogy was first excited by hearing a lecture from Daubanton, after which he became a diligent student under that professor. By a happy accident, he made an important discovery in crystallography in 1781. As he was examining a prism of calcareous spar in the cabinet of a friend, it fell and was broken into fragments, which presented crystalline faces different from those of the prism, and revealed to him the germ of a new science. Continuing his observations, he demonstrated that the structure of crystals is conformed to invariable laws, that the same mineral contains uniformly the same primary form as the basis of its crystallization, and that they may be cloven in such directions as to lay bare their peculiar primitive forms which lie concealed within them. These discoveries opened a new era in mineralogy, and, when modestly announced to the Academy of Sciences, made a profound sensation. In 1783 Haüy was chosen a member of that Academy. In 1792 he was imprisoned a short time by the revolutionists for refusing to take the required oath. In 1794 the Convention intrusted to him the charge of the cabinet of the School of Mines, and in 1802 he became professor of mineralogy in the Museum of Natural History. Napoleon granted him a pension, and named him canon of Notre-Dame and a member of the legion of honour. At the formation of the University he obtained the chair of the faculty of sciences. Amidst the homage of the great world he preserved the modest simplicity of his manners which had distinguished his early life. He published a "Treatise on Mineralogy," (1801,) a standard work of great merit; an "Elementary Treatise on Physics," (1803;) and a "Treatise on Crystallography," (1822.) He refused an offer of 600,000 francs for his collection of minerals. Cuvier has observed that the discoveries of Haüy, like those of Newton, far from losing in generality with the lapse of time, will continually gain in that respect. Died in 1822.

"From the moment that the genius of Haüy discovered the general fact that they could be cloven or split in such directions as to lay bare their peculiar primitive or fundamental forms, (which lay concealed within them as the statue might be conceived encrusted in its marble envelope,) from that moment mineralogy ceased to be an unmeaning list of names, a mere laborious cataloguing of stones and rubbish." (Sir John Herschel, "Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy.")

See CUVIER'S "Memoir on R. J. Haüy," and translation of the same in "Smithsonian Report" for 1860; LUIGI CONFIGLIACHI, "Memorie intorno alla Vita ed alle Opere dei due Naturalisti Werner e Haüy," 1827; QUÉRARD, "La France Littéraire;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Haüy, (VALENTIN,) brother of the preceding, was born at Saint-Just, in France, in 1745. He was noted for his zeal and success in the education of the blind, a branch of instruction which had been entirely neglected before he, with the aid of the Philanthropic Society, opened a school in Paris in 1784. His success having attracted the attention of the public, Haüy received the title of interpreter and secretary to the king, who took his school under the protection of the state. He published an "Essay on the Education of the Blind," (1786.) About 1800 he ceased to be director of the institution, and his services were acknowledged by the grant of a pension of two thousand francs. A few years later, he founded an institution for the blind in Saint Petersburg. Died in Paris in 1822.

Hav'e-lock, (Sir HENRY,) a distinguished British general, born at Bishop's Wearmouth, Durham, on the 5th of April, 1795. He entered the army in 1815, as lieutenant, and was ordered to India in 1823. He distinguished himself by his attention to the religious instruction of the men under his command, and was a strict disciplinarian. About 1828 he married Hannah, a daughter of the Rev. Mr. Marshman, a missionary. In consequence of his earnest and zealous religious character he was stigmatized as a fanatic by many of his fellow-officers. His promotion was slow. He obtained the rank of captain in 1838, and served on the staff of Sir W. Cotton in the Afghan war. He came to England on sick-leave in 1849, and remained there about two years. In the spring of 1854 he was appointed quartermaster-general. He became adjutant-general in the ensuing winter, and commanded a division in the war against Persia which began in 1856. He returned to India about the beginning of the great Sepoy mutiny which broke out in February, 1857. In July he defeated the Sepoys at Futtehpore, Arny, and Cawnpore. Having driven Nana Sahib out of Cawnpore, he advanced with about 1500 men to the relief of Lucknow, in which a small garrison was besieged by a large army of Sepoys; but his army was so reduced by disease and the casualties of battle that he was compelled to fall back and await reinforcements. In the mean time General Outram, superior in rank to Havelock, arrived; but he generously waived his rank, and offered to serve as a volunteer, declaring that Havelock was entitled to the honour of relieving Lucknow. He entered that place about the 25th of September, and defended it until the arrival of Sir Colin Campbell. He was promoted to the rank of major-general in September, 1857, and died in India in November of the same year.

Havemann, hä'vẹh-män', (WILHELM,) a German historian, born at Lüneburg in 1800, wrote a "History of Brunswick and Lüneburg," etc. Died in 1869.

Hā'vẹn, (ALICE,) originally EMILY BRADLEY, an authoress, born at Hudson, New York, September 13, 1828. Her first husband was Joseph C. Neal, of Philadelphia, editor of Neal's "Saturday Gazette." Among his works are "Music and Morals," "Thoughts for the Times," "Speech in Season," "Current Coin," "Arrows in the Air," "Ashes to Ashes," and "American Humourists," (1883.) His wife, MARY E., a daughter of T. M. Joy, the artist, is herself distinguished as an author, painter, and illustrator.

Haweis, (THOMAS,) an English theologian, born at Truro in 1734, was chaplain to the Countess of Huntingdon. He published, besides other works, "The Communicant's Spiritual Companion," (1763,) and a "History of the Church of Christ," (3 vols., 1800.) Died in 1820

Hawes, hauz, (JOEL,) an American writer and Congregational minister, born in Medway, Massachusetts, in 1789. He graduated at Brown University in 1813, and preached many years at Hartford, Connecticut. Among his works are "Lectures to Young Men," (1828,) and "The Religion of the East," (1845.) Died in 1867.

Hawes, hauz, (STEPHEN,) an English poet, who lived about 1500, was a native of Suffolk, and became groom of the privy chamber to Henry VII. He published in 1517 "The Pastime of Pleasure," an allegorical poem, which displays much learning and reflection. Warton says, "If the poems of Rowley are not genuine, the 'Pastime of Pleasure' is almost the only effort of imagination and invention which had appeared in our poetry since Chaucer."

Hawes, (WILLIAM,) an English physician, born at Islington in 1736, practised in London the most of his life. He distinguished himself by his zealous efforts in behalf of the Humane Society, instituted in 1774. He published several medical works, and an "Account of Dr. Goldsmith's Last Illness." Died in 1808.

Hawes, (WILLIAM,) an English musician and composer, born in London in 1785. Beginning with Weber's "Der Freischütz" in 1824, he adapted a number of foreign operas to the English stage, and effected a great revolution in the public taste. He also composed a number of glees, songs, and madrigals. Died February 18, 1846.

He published "Records of the Western Shore," (1836,) "Ecclesia," (1840,) "Echoes from Old Cornwall," (1845,) "The Quest of the San Greal," (1864,) and "Cornish Ballads," (1869.) The last-named volume contains his famous "Song of the Western Men," which had first appeared anonymously in a Plymouth paper and deceived both Sir Walter Scott and Macaulay into the belief that it was a genuine old ballad. Died at Plymouth, August 15, 1875. Twelve hours before his death he was received into the Roman Catholic communion.

Hawkesworth, hauks'wọrth, (JOHN,) an English essayist, born in London between 1715 and 1719. He began his literary career as a contributor to the "Gentleman's Magazine" about 1740. In 1752, 1753, and 1754 he gained distinction as the editor of the "Adventurer," a series of essays, in which he was assisted by Dr. Johnson and others. About half of these were his own composition. In 1761 he published an edition of Swift's Works, with a life of that author, which is highly commended. He received from government £6000 for writing an account of Captain Cook's First Voyage, (1773.) Hawkesworth is accounted one of the most elegant essayists of his time. Dr. Johnson, in his "Life of Swift," represents him as one "capable of dignifying his narrations with elegance of language and force of sentiment." Died in 1773.

See DRAKE, "Essays;" W. H. PRESCOTT, "Miscellanies."

Haw'kins, (BENJAMIN WATERHOUSE,) an English naturalist, artist, and geologist, born in London in 1807. He published several educational works, among which is "Elements of Form," (1842.) He lectured in New York in 1868. He is eminently skilful in delineating the forms of animals and in restoring fossil remains.

Hawkins, (Sir JOHN,) M.P., (called by the Italian and Spanish writers of that day Achines or Aquines,) an able English naval officer, born at Plymouth about 1520. After following the slave-trade several years, he was defeated by the Spanish in 1567 near San Juan de Ulloa. As rear-admiral, in 1588, he served with distinction against the Spanish Armada, and was rewarded with the honour of knighthood. In 1595 Hawkins and Drake commanded a large fleet sent against the Spanish colonies in the West Indies; but they were unsuccessful. He is said to have been the first Englishman who was engaged in the slave-trade. Died in 1595.

See CAMPBELL, "Lives of British Admirals;" FROUDE, "History of England," vol. vii.; J. BARROW, "Memoirs of the Naval Worthies of Queen Elizabeth's Reign," 1845.

Hawkins, (Sir JOHN,) a descendant of the preceding, born in London in 1719, was educated for the law. In 1749 he was admitted a member of Johnson's literary club that met in Ivy Lane. In the early part of his life he contributed to the "Gentleman's Magazine." Having married in 1753 a wealthy lady named Storer, he retired from the practice of law. In 1763 he was elected a member of the celebrated literary club to which Burke, Johnson, and Goldsmith belonged, and in 1772 he was knighted for his active services in the magistracy. His principal productions are a "History of Music," (in 5 vols., 1776,) (which was coldly received, but is now more esteemed,) and a "Life of Dr. Johnson," (1787.) He was an intimate friend of Johnson, who chose him as one of his executors. He died in 1789, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Hawkins, (JOHN SIDNEY,) eldest son of the preceding, was born about 1757. He wrote a "Life of Da Vinci," and essays on various subjects. Died in 1842.

Hawkins, (LÆTITIA MATILDA,) a sister of the preceding, wrote "The Countess and Gertrude," a novel, (4 vols., 1811,) "Memoirs, Biographical Sketches, and Anecdotes," (2 vols., 1824,) and other works.

Hawkins, (Sir RICHARD,) an English mariner, son of the rear-admiral, noticed above, was born about 1555. He commanded one of the ships which encountered the "Invincible Armada" in 1588. In 1593 he led an expedition of three ships to the South Sea, and was captured by the Spaniards near Peru. After his release he published "Observations" on the voyage. Died in 1622.

See J. BARROW, "Memoirs of the Naval Worthies of Queen Elizabeth's Reign," 1845.

Hawkins, (Sir THOMAS,) an English translator, lived in the reign of Charles I. He produced a version of the Odes of Horace, (1631.)

Hawks, hauks, (CICERO STEPHENS,) D.D., an American bishop, a brother of the following, was born at New-Berne, North Carolina, May 26, 1812. He graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1830, and took priest's orders (Episcopalian) in 1836. In 1844 he was consecrated Bishop of Missouri. Died at Saint Louis, April 19, 1868.

Hawks, hauks, (FRANCIS LISTER,) D.D., an American clergyman and author, born at Newbern, North Carolina, in 1798. He studied law and was admitted to the bar; but his religious convictions induced him in 1821 to enter the ministry of the Episcopal Church. In 1829 he became pastor of a church in Philadelphia. In 1830 he assumed the pastoral charge of Saint Stephen's Church in New York, and afterwards of Saint Thomas's. In 1837 he and Dr. C. S. Henry commenced the "New York Review," which they continued to publish until 1841. He preached in New Orleans for five years, (1844–49,) and became rector of Calvary Church, New York, about 1850. Among his various works are "Egypt and its Monuments," (1849,) and a "History of North Carolina," (1857 et seq.) He edited the "Romance of Biography," and other juvenile works. Died at New York in 1866.

Hawk'shaw, (Sir JOHN,) an English engineer, born at Leeds in 1811. He early engaged in railway-construction, in which, as in bridge-building, drainage, dock- and harbour-works, etc., he became a distinguished expert. The great Amsterdam ship-canal, opened in 1876, was his work. He published "Reminiscences of South America," and many professional papers. Died in 1891.

Hawks'moor, (NICHOLAS,) an eminent English architect, born in 1666, was a pupil of Sir Christopher Wren. He was employed on several churches of London, and made additions to All-Souls College, Oxford. It is said that he was associated with Vanbrugh on the palace of Blenheim and Castle Howard. One of his most admired and original works is Saint George's Church, Bloomsbury, which Walpole criticised as "a master-stroke of absurdity." Died in 1736.

Hawk'wood, (Sir JOHN,) an English military adventurer, was the leader of a band of outlaws who entered Italy about 1360. He rendered himself famous by his skill, audacity, and success, and was hired to fight by the Florentines and the Visconti of Milan. He died at Florence in 1394.

Haw'ley, (GIDEON,) a missionary, who laboured among the American Indians, was born in Connecticut in 1727. He became pastor at Mashpee, Massachusetts, in 1758, and remained there until his death in 1807.

Hawley, (JOSEPH,) an American patriot, born at Northampton, Massachusetts, in 1724, graduated at Yale in 1742. He practised law in his native place, and attained eminence in his profession. In the contest between the colonies and the mother-country he gained distinction by his political wisdom, eloquence, and patriotism. He was chosen a member of the Massachusetts legislature in 1764. In 1776 ill health induced him to retire from public life. Died in 1788.

Hawley, (JOSEPH ROSWELL,) LL.D., an American Senator, born at Stewartsville, North Carolina, October 31, 1826. His father was of Connecticut birth. He graduated at Hamilton College in 1847, and in 1850 began to practise law in Hartford, Connecticut. In 1857 he became editor of the Hartford "Press." He served, 1861–66, in the Federal army, attaining the rank of brigadier- and brevet major-general. In 1866 he became editor of the Hartford "Courant." He was chosen Governor of the State in 1866, was elected to the Forty-Second, Forty-Third, and Forty-Sixth Congresses, and in 1881 was sent to the United States Senate.

Hâ'worth, (ADRIAN,) an English naturalist of Cottenham, Yorkshire. He wrote, among other treatises, "Lepidoptera Britannica," (4 parts, 1803–28,) which is called a work of great value. Died in 1833.

Haw'thorne, (JULIAN,) an American novelist, a son of Nathaniel Hawthorne, was born at Boston, June 22, 1846. His early years were largely passed in Europe. He was connected with classes in Harvard University, 1863–68, and studied civil engineering at Dresden, 1868–70; was employed, 1870–72, in the department of docks in New York, since which time he has lived much in England and Germany. His principal works are "Bressant," (1873,) "Idolatry," "Saxon Studies," "Garth," "Archibald Malmaison," "The Laughing Mill," "Dust," "Fortune's Fool," (1883,) "Beatrix Randolph," (1884,) and "Nathaniel Hawthorne and his Wife," (a biography, 1884.)

Haw'thorne, (NATHANIEL,) a distinguished American author, was born at Salem, Massachusetts, on the 4th of July, 1804. His father, a ship-captain, died at Havana about 1810. Nathaniel graduated at Bowdoin College in 1825, Longfellow the poet being one of his classmates. He was endowed by nature with an acute and subtle intellect, and with imaginative powers of no common order; but these were associated with an extreme and almost morbid sensibility. While at college, his health was delicate, and he is said to have suffered from excessive diffidence and from occasional fits of gloom and deep dejection. Under these circumstances he made the acquaintance of Franklin Pierce, (afterwards President of the United States,) who did much to cheer and encourage him in his moments of despondency. The friendship thus begun lasted through life. After leaving college, Hawthorne spent several years mostly in seclusion and study, writing occasional tales for the papers and periodicals. In 1837 he issued a volume entitled "Twice-told Tales," so named because they had previously been published in another form. This book attracted the notice of Mr. Longfellow, who spoke of it in terms of high praise in the "North American Review." In 1843 Mr. Hawthorne removed to Concord, and resided for some time in an old manse, from the windows of which, it is said, the minister of the parish looked out upon the battle fought between his fellow-townsmen and the British troops on the memorable 19th of April, 1775. In 1846 appeared a volume entitled "Mosses from an Old Manse," a collection of sketches and tales written by him while occupying the manse at Concord. In 1846, under Mr. Polk's administration, he was appointed surveyor of the port of Salem, a position which he held for three years. He published in 1850 his celebrated "Scarlet Letter," a romance of extraordinary power, which raised its author at once to the first rank among American prose writers of fiction. In 1851 appeared his "House of the Seven Gables," in 1852 his "Blithedale Romance," and in 1860 his "Marble Faun," regarded by some as the best of all his works. He had published in 1852 a life of his friend Franklin Pierce, (the Democratic candidate for the Presidency,) who, after his inauguration, appointed his biographer United States consul for Liverpool, perhaps the most lucrative position within the gift of a President. He held this office for four years, after which he spent some time in travelling on the continent of Europe. Soon after his return to the United States, Mr. Hawthorne published "Our Old Home," (1863,) containing sketches of English life and character. He died May 18, 1864, and was buried at Concord, Mass. After his death a very attractive work, consisting of his observations, and entitled "Hawthorne's Notes," was published, (2 vols., 1869.)

Mr. Hawthorne's merits as an author are of a peculiar and very high order. As a novelist, all critics acknowledge his power to awaken a deep, intense, and sustained interest; but some of the reviewers object that the tone of his works is not healthful. "The Scarlet Letter," says "Blackwood" for May, 1855, "glows with the fire of a suppressed, secret, feverish excitement: it is not the glow of natural life, but the hectic of disease, which burns upon the cheek of its actors." "The House of the Seven Gables is not less remarkable nor less unwholesome than its predecessor." But, whatever may be thought of the tone of his works, all must concede to him not only great originality, but a rare power of subtle analysis, a delicate and exquisite humour, and a marvellous felicity in the use of language. His style, indeed, may be said to combine almost every excellence,—elegance, simplicity, grace, clearness, and force.

Haw'trey, (EDWARD CRAVEN,) D.D., an English scholar, born in 1789, became head-master of Eton about 1834, and afterwards provost of the same. Died in 1862.

Haxo, hȧk'sō', (FRANÇOIS NICOLAS BENOÎT,) an able military engineer, born at Lunéville in 1774. He directed the operations at the siege of Saragossa, (1809.) In 1812 he held a high command in the Russian campaign, and was made general of division. He commanded the corps of engineers during the Hundred Days, and was at Waterloo. In 1832 he conducted the siege of Antwerp as commander-in-chief of the engineers. Died in 1838.

See MENGIN, "Notice sur Général Baron Haxo," 1838.

Haxo, (NICOLAS,) a French general, uncle of the preceding, was born at Lunéville about 1750. He distinguished himself at the battle of Chollet, and gained a victory at Noirmoutiers. He was killed in 1794.

Haxthausen, von, fon hȧxt'hŏw'zẹn, (AUGUST FRANZ LUDWIG MARIA,) BARON HAXTHAUSEN-ABBENBURG, a German publicist, was born at Paderborn, February 3, 1792, and was educated at Göttingen. Having large estates, he gave great attention to the land-laws and the condition of the peasantry, especially in North Germany and Russia. Died at Hanover, January 1, 1867. Among his works are "The Land Laws of East and West Prussia," (1839,) "The Real State of Popular Life in Russia," (1847–52,) "The Military Power of Russia," (1852,) "Transcaucasia," (in English, 1854,) etc.

Hāy, (DAVID RAMSAY,) a British artist and eminent writer on the principles of form and colour, was born in Edinburgh in 1798. He learned the trade of house-painter, and was employed by Sir Walter Scott in the decoration of Abbotsford. In 1828 he published "The Laws of Harmonious Colouring," (6th edition, 1847.) He wrote, among other works, "Proportion, or the Geometric Principle of Beauty Analyzed," (1843,) "Science of Proportions of the Human Head and Countenance," (1849,) and "The Science of Beauty as Developed in Nature and Applied in Art," (1856.) Died Sept. 10, 1866.

Hāy, (JAMES,) a Scottish diplomatist, employed by James I.. He was raised to the English peerage as Earl of Carlisle. Died in 1636.

Hay, (JOHN,) an American writer, born at Salem, Illinois, October 8, 1839. He graduated in 1858 at Brown University, and in 1861 was admitted to the bar at Springfield, Illinois. From 1861 to 1865 he was private secretary and aide to President Lincoln, serving a part of that time in the field, and attaining the rank of colonel. He was in the diplomatic service from 1865 to 1870, was employed on the "New York Tribune," 1870–76, and again in 1881, and was an assistant secretary of state in Washington, 1879–81. His principal works are "Pike County Ballads," (1871,) and "Castilian Days," (1871.)

Hay, (WILLIAM,) born in Sussex, England, about 1700, represented Seaford in Parliament from 1734 to 1755. He published an "Essay on Civil Government," (1728,) and a few other works. Died in 1755.

Hayden, hā'dn, (FERDINAND VANDEVEER,) LL.D., a distinguished geologist, born at Westfield, Massachusetts, September 7, 1829. He graduated at Oberlin College in 1850, and at the Albany Medical School in 1853. For many years he conducted the United States government exploring expeditions in the far West. His explorations began in 1853 and continued about thirty years. During a part of this time (1865–72) he was also professor of geology at the University of Pennsylvania. He prepared a long series of government geological and geographical reports. Died at Philadelphia, December 22, 1887.

Haydn, hā'd'n, [Ger. pron. hīd'n,] (JOSEPH,) a celebrated and original composer, was born at Rohrau, on the frontier of Austria and Hungary, March 31, 1732. His father was a poor mechanic. When he was about eight years old, his voice attracted the notice of Reuter, chapel-master of the cathedral in Vienna, under whom he passed eight years as chorister. Afterwards, being left to his own resources, he endured extreme poverty for several years, during which he became acquainted with the poet Metastasio, from whom he learned Italian. He received some lessons in composition from Porpor', and between the ages of nineteen and twenty-six composed many sonatas, concertos, and symphonies, which were admired. In 1760 he was appointed chapel-master to Prince Esterhazy at Eisenstadt. With this patron and his heir he passed about thirty years, and enjoyed prosperity, excepting the troubles of an ill-assorted marriage, from which he was relieved by a divorce. Having composed a great number of works and acquired a wide reputation, he produced in London in 1791 six grand symphonies, which were received with great enthusiasm. His noble master-piece the oratorio of "The Creation" was performed in Vienna in 1798, and procured his admission into the French Institute. He surpassed his predecessors in symphonies, and displayed extraordinary fertility of invention. Among his last works is a piece of church music called "The Seasons," (1801.) Died at Vienna, May 31, 1809. Haydn appears to have been exempt from the spirit of rivalry and envy. On one occasion he designated Mozart as the first composer of the world. His happy and genial temperament is reflected in his compositions.

Haydn, hā'd'n, (JOSEPH,) an English author, who published a "Dictionary of Dates and Universal Reference," which is highly commended; also a "Hand-Book of Dignities." Died in London in 1856.

Haydn, (MICHAEL,) a brother of Joseph Haydn the musician, was born at Rohrau in 1737. He was an excellent organist and composer, and became chapel-master in the cathedral of Salzburg. He composed numerous oratorios, masses, Te Deums, and other works. His brother Joseph considered him the greatest composer of sacred music of his time except Mozart. Died in 1808.

See FÉTIS, "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens."

Hāy'dọn, (BENJAMIN ROBERT,) an eminent English painter, born at Plymouth in 1786. He went to London in 1804, and was admitted as a student at the Royal Academy. In 1807 he exhibited a painting of the Holy Family resting during their flight to Egypt. In 1809 his "Dentatus" gained the first prize in the exhibition of the British Institution. His "Judgment of Solomon" was purchased for seven hundred guineas. In the early part of his career he quarrelled with the Academy, and when he applied for admission as an associate he was refused. In 1815 he opened a school of painting, in which several eminent artists were formed; but in pecuniary matters he was not successful. While confined in prison for debt in 1827, he painted the "Mock Election," for which George IV. paid him five hundred guineas. "Napoleon Musing at Saint Helena" was one of his most admired productions. In 1837–38–39 he gave lectures on Painting, which were very popular, and were published in 1844. The last years of his life were rendered unhappy by pecuniary difficulties, and his mind became so disordered that he committed suicide in June, 1846. His merit as a painter is variously estimated. The Landseers were his pupils.

Haye, La. See CORMENIN and DELAHAYE.

Hayer, hȧ'yȧ', (JEAN NICOLAS HUBERT,) a French monk, born at Sarre-Louis about 1708. He defended revealed religion against infidels in several works. Died in 1780.

Hayer du Perron, le, lẹh hȧ'yȧ' dü pȧ'rôN', (PIERRE,) a French poet, born at Alençon in 1603; died after 1678.

Hayes, hāz, (AUGUSTUS ALLEN,) an American chemist, born at Windsor, Vermont, in 1806. He made several important discoveries, and contributed to Silliman's "Journal," and other publications. Died in 1882.

Hayes, hāz, (CATHERINE,) a popular vocalist, born at Limerick, Ireland, about 1820. She performed with success in the theatres of Italy, Vienna, and London. In 1851 she visited the United States, and sang in the principal cities. Died in 1861.

See "Gentleman's Magazine" for September, 1861.

Hayes, (CHARLES,) an English mathematician, born in 1678, wrote learned and ingenious works, among which are treatises on "Fluxions and Conic Sections," on "Longitude," and "Chronology of the Septuagint." Died in 1760.

Hayes, (ISAAC I.,) an American explorer, born in Chester county, Pennsylvania, in 1832, graduated as M.D. at the University of Pennsylvania in 1853. The same year he accompanied Dr. Kane on an exploring expedition to the North Pole. After passing two winters in the northern regions, blocked up in the ice, and suffering incredible hardships, they returned in the autumn of 1855. (See KANE, ELISHA K.) Dr. Hayes published an interesting account of his share in this expedition, entitled "An Arctic Boat Journey," (Boston, 1860.) In 1860 he conducted a second expedition to the Arctic regions, and returned in the autumn of 1861. He afterwards wrote "Cast away in the Cold," (1868,) and "The Land of Desolation," (1870.) Died December 17, 1881.

Hayes, (RUTHERFORD BIRCHARD,) nineteenth President of the United States, was born at Delaware, Ohio, October 14, 1822. He graduated at Kenyon College in 1842, and, having studied law in Harvard University, he practised as a lawyer in Cincinnati, 1849–61; served with distinction in the civil war, 1861–65, attaining the rank of brigadier- and brevet major-general; was a Representative in Congress, 1865–67; was chosen Governor of Ohio in 1867, and re-elected in 1869, and again in 1875. In 1876 he became the Republican nominee for the Presidency, Mr. S. J. Tilden being the Democratic candidate. After the election, a dispute arose regarding the validity of the votes returned by South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida, the electoral votes of these States, with one from Oregon, being claimed by both parties; but an Electoral Commission, appointed by Congress for the settlement of the controversy, gave all the disputed votes to General Hayes, who became President March 4, 1877. A creditable administration followed, at the close of which Mr. Hayes retired from political life. Died January 17, 1893.

Hayez, ä'yä', (FRANCESCO,) an Italian historical painter and excellent colorist, born at Venice in 1792. Among his works are "Laocoon," and "The Two Foscari." Died February. 11, 1882.

See "Westminster Review" for April, 1841.

Haygood, hā'good, (ATTICUS GREENE,) D.D., an American educator, born at Watkinsville, Georgia, November 19, 1839. He graduated at Emory College in 1859, entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1859, and was president of Emory College from 1876 to 1884. In 1882 he was appointed agent of the John F. Slater Fund for the education of the freedmen. His principal works are "Go or Send," (1873,) "Our Children," (1876,) "Our Brother in Black," (1881,) "Sermons and Speeches," (1883,) etc.

Hay'ley, (WILLIAM,) an English author, born at Chichester in 1745, resided at Eartham, and enjoyed an easy fortune in literary pursuits. In 1792 he became acquainted with the poet Cowper, whose life he afterwards wrote, (1804.) He published a variety of works in prose and verse, which once were very popular, but are not now ranked above mediocrity. His chief poems are "An Essay on History," (1780,) "Triumphs of Temper," (1781,) "An Essay on Painting," and "An Essay on Epic Poetry," (1782.) He was not without taste, and possessed some skill in versification; but his poetry is feeble and infected with mawkish sentiment. Southey once remarked, "Every thing about that man is good except his poetry." Died in 1820.

See "Memoirs of W. Hayley," by himself, 1823; CAREY, "Lives of English Poets from Johnson to Kirke White;" "Quarterly Review" for December, 1824.

Haym, hīm, (NICCOLÒ FRANCESCO,) a musician and bibliographer, born in Rome about 1680. He composed several admired sonatas, and published a valuable work on Italian bibliography, called "Notices of Rare Books in the Italian Language," (1726.) Died in London in 1730.

Hay'man, (FRANCIS,) an English historical painter, born at Exeter in 1708, lived chiefly in London. He was one of the earliest members of the Royal Academy. Among his principal productions are his illustrations of Shakspeare and Milton. Died in 1776.

Haymo or Haimo, hī'mo, or Aimo, ī'mo, a German ecclesiastic, whose writings had a high reputation, became Bishop of Halberstadt in 841 A.D. He wrote "Commentaries on the Scriptures." Died in 853.

Haynald, hī'nâld, (LOUIS, or LAJOS,) a Hungarian cardinal, born at Szecseny, October 3, 1816. He studied at Gran and Vienna, and was a divinity professor in the seminary at Gran. He was elevated to the episcopate in 1851, was Bishop of Karlsburg, 1852–63, was named Archbishop of Carthage in 1863, and of Kalocsa and Bács in 1867. In 1879 he was created a cardinal-priest. In that year he was chosen president of the Hungarian delegation. Cardinal Haynald was distinguished as a botanist, and as the educator and friend of young scientists, whatever their religious faith. Died July 4, 1891.

Haynau, von, fon hī'nŏw, (JULIUS JAKOB,) BARON, an Austrian general, born at Cassel in 1786, was a natural son of the Elector of Hesse-Cassel. He entered the Austrian service in 1801, became colonel in 1830, and field-marshal-lieutenant in 1844. In the suppression of a revolt in Italy in 1848 and 1849, he displayed some military skill and became notorious for his cruelty. He obtained in May, 1849, the chief command of the Austrian army in Hungary, and defeated the Hungarians in several actions. The execution of the vanquished chiefs and patriots by his orders excited general indignation. He was deprived of his command in 1850. During a visit to London in 1850, he was assaulted and roughly treated by the draymen of Barclay & Perkins's brewery. Died in 1853.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Hāyne, (ARTHUR P.,) a brother of Robert Y. Hayne, noticed below, was born at Charleston, South Carolina, in 1790. He entered the army in 1807, served during the war of 1812, distinguished himself at the battle of New Orleans, January, 1815, and obtained the rank of adjutant-general. He resigned his commission in 1820, and became a lawyer. In 1858 he was chosen a United States Senator. Died January 7, 1867.

Hayne, hī'nẹh, (FRIEDRICH GOTTLOB,) a German botanist, born in 1763, became professor of botany at Berlin. He published, besides other works, an excellent "Description and Representation of Plants used in Medicine," (11 vols., 1802–31, with 600 plates designed by himself.) Died in 1832.

See CALLISEN, "Medicinisches Schriftsteller-Lexikon."

Hayne, (ISAAC,) an officer, born in South Carolina in 1745, became a wealthy planter. He served against the British at the siege of Charleston in 1780, was taken prisoner and paroled. The British by threats induced him to subscribe a declaration of allegiance, and afterwards required him to take arms for the king. To avoid this necessity, he joined the American army, was taken prisoner, and hung in August, 1781.

Hayne, (JULIA DEAN,) a popular American actress, born at Pleasant Valley, New York, in 1830, performed with success in the United States and England. Died March 6, 1868.

Hayne, (PAUL H.,) a poet, and nephew of Robert Y. Hayne, was born at Charleston, South Carolina, in 1831. He published volumes of Poems in 1854, 1857, and 1859, and a complete edition in 1881. Died July 6, 1886.

Hayne, (ROBERT YOUNG,) a distinguished American orator, born in the parish of Saint Paul, South Carolina, in 1791, was a grand-nephew of Isaac Hayne, who was executed by the British in 1781. He studied law with Langdon Cheves, and became eminent in his profession. In 1818 he was chosen Speaker of the legislature of South Carolina, which he represented in the national Senate from 1823 to 1832. In January, 1830, he made an eloquent speech in the Senate, to which Webster replied in one of his most successful and memorable efforts. He was Governor of his native State from 1832 to 1834, and advocated nullification. Died in 1840.

See "National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans" vol. ii.

Hayne, (Rev. THOMAS,) an English critic and teacher, born in Leicestershire in 1581, was a graduate of Oxford, and an excellent linguist. He published a "Latin Grammar," a "Life of Luther," a "General View of the Holy Scripture," and other works. Died in 1645.

Haynes, hānz, (HOPTON,) born in 1672, was assay-master of the English mint, and a friend of Sir Isaac Newton. He wrote zealously in defence of Unitarian doctrines. Died in 1749.

Haynes, (JOHN,) an Anglo-American governor, was born in Essex, England, and removed to Boston in 1633. In 1635 he was chosen Governor of Massachusetts. In 1636 he became one of the chief founders of Connecticut, of which he was chosen the first Governor in 1639, and was afterwards several times re-elected. Died in 1654.

Haynes, hānz, (LEMUEL,) an eminent coloured minister, born in West Hartford, Connecticut, in 1753. He early displayed a remarkable thirst for knowledge, and, by devoting all his leisure to study, became in a few years a good Latin and Greek scholar. In 1775 he joined the American army, and the next year served in the expedition to Ticonderoga. Licensed to preach in 1780, he was thirty years pastor in West Rutland, Vermont. From 1822 until his death, in 1833, he preached to a congregation in Granville, New York. His famous sermon against Universalism, in reply to Hosea Ballou, has been widely read. A memoir of his life was published by the Rev. Dr. Cooley.

Hays, hāz, (ALEXANDER,) an American general, born in Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, about 1824, graduated at West Point in 1844. He became a brigadier-general of volunteers in September, 1862, commanded a division at Gettysburg, July, 1863, and was killed at the battle of the Wilderness in May, 1864.

Hays, (WILLIAM JACOB,) a painter of animals, was born in the city of New York in 1830. He produced many pictures of dogs and game. Died March 13, 1875.

Hāy'tẹr, (Sir GEORGE,) an English painter of history and portraits, was born in London about 1792. He studied for several years in Italy, and after his return obtained the title of first painter to the queen, by whom he was knighted in 1842. Among his finest productions are "Victoria taking the Oath at the Coronation," and "The Trial of Lord Russell." Died in 1871.

Hayter, (Rev. JOHN,) an Englishman, who was employed to superintend the process of unrolling the Greek manuscripts found at Herculaneum. He published a "Report on the Herculaneum Manuscripts," (1811.) Died in 1818.

Hāy'wạrd, (Sir JOHN,) an English historian, who published in 1599 "The First Part of the Reign of Henry IV." He was knighted in 1619. He also wrote the lives of William I., William II., and Henry I. Died in 1627.

Haywood, (ELIZA.) See HEYWOOD.

Hāy'wood, (ELIZABETH,) an English authoress, born in London in 1693, wrote "The Female Spectator," and other works. Died in 1756.

Haz'ạrd, (EBENEZER,) born in Philadelphia about 1744, was postmaster-general of the United States from 1782 to 1789. He published "Historical Collection of State Papers," etc., (1792.) Died in 1817.

Hazard, (ROWLAND GIBSON,) LL.D., an American author, born in South Kingston, Rhode Island, October 9, 1801. He became a wealthy manufacturer. Among his works are "Essay on Language," (1834,) "Freedom of the Mind in Willing," (1864,) "Causation and Freedom," (1869,) etc. Died June 25, 1888.

Hazard, (SAMUEL,) a son of the preceding, was born in Philadelphia in 1784. He published in 1828–36 the "Register of Pennsylvania," containing historical documents, etc. He also wrote the "Annals of Pennsylvania from 1609 to 1682." Died May 22, 1870.

Hā'zen, (WILLIAM B.,) an American general, born in Vermont in 1830, graduated at West Point in 1855. He served as colonel at the battle of Shiloh, April 7, 1862, and as brigadier-general at the battles of Stone River, Chickamauga, and Chattanooga in 1863. He commanded under General Sherman in the campaign against Atlanta, and in the march to the sea, in 1864. He was made a major-general of volunteers in that year, became colonel in the regular army in 1866, and in 1880 was appointed chief signal officer to the army. Died January 16, 1887.

Hā'zle-rig, written also Heselrige, (Sir ARTHUR,) an English Puritan, who took a prominent part in the opposition to Charles I., was born about 1612. He represented Leicestershire in the Long Parliament, and was one of the five members whom the king attempted to arrest in 1642 on a charge of treason. During the civil war he served in the army of Parliament as colonel. In 1649 he was chosen a member of the council of state, and in 1658 was created a peer by Cromwell, but preferred to retain his seat in the House of Commons. Died in 1660.

Hăz'litt, (WILLIAM,) an eminent English critic and miscellaneous author, born at Maidstone, April 10, 1778, was the son of a Unitarian minister. After making creditable essays in the art of painting, he adopted literature as a profession, and in 1803 obtained employment as a reporter for the London newspapers. In 1805 he published his first work, "An Essay on the Principles of Human Action," followed by "The Eloquence of the British Senate," (1808,) with critical notes. In 1808 he married Miss Stoddart. Between 1813 and 1818 he delivered lectures on philosophy and English poetry, some of which were published and favourably received. Of his very numerous and various works the following are perhaps the principal: "Characters of Shakspeare's Plays," (1817,) "Original Essays," (1821,) "The Spirit of the Age," (1824,) "The Plain Speaker," "Political Essays," "Table-Talk," (1824,) and "The Life of Napoleon," (4 vols., 1828.) In the latter part of his life he contributed to the "Edinburgh Review." He enjoyed a high reputation as a critic; but allowance must be made for his prejudice against living authors. Sir Archibald Alison expressed the opinion that "in critical disquisitions on the leading characters and works of the drama, he is not surpassed in the whole range of English literature." He was a sincere and honest man, but had serious moral and mental defects. Died in 1830.

See "Literary Remains of W. Hazlitt, with a Notice of his Life, by his Son," etc., 2 vols., 1836. For a full account of Hazlitt's Works, see "List of the Writings of William Hazlitt and Leigh Hunt, chronologically arranged," etc., by ALEXANDER IRELAND, London, 1868; WILLIAM CAREW HAZLITT, "Memoirs of William Hazlitt," London, 1867; see also the "Edinburgh Review" for August, 1817, and January, 1837; "Monthly Review" for 1826.

He distinguished himself as the translator of various works, among which are a "Life of Luther," (1846,) Guizot's "History of the English Revolution," (1846,) and Thierry's "History of the Conquest of England by the Normans," (1847.) He edited the Works of De Foe, (1840,) and those of his father. Died in 1893.

His son, WILLIAM CAREW H., born in 1834, published a "History of the Republic of Venice," (4 vols. 1860.)

Head, hed, (Sir EDMUND WALKER,) an English colonial governor, born near Maidstone, Kent, in 1805. He was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick in 1847, and succeeded Lord Elgin as Governor-General of Canada in 1854. He wrote a "Hand-Book of the History of the Spanish and French Schools of Painting," (1848,) a work of merit. Died in January, 1868.

Head, (Sir FRANCIS BOND,) a popular English writer, born near Rochester, Kent, in 1793. He was a captain in the army when, in 1825, he went to South America as agent of a mining association, and in 1826 published "Rough Notes of a Journey across the Pampas," etc., which was received with much favour. In 1833 he produced a successful humorous book, called "Bubbles from the Brunnen of Nassau." He became in 1836 Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada, in which an insurrection broke out in 1837. After the suppression of this he resigned, and returned to England in 1838. He wrote "The Emigrant," and other works. Died July 20, 1875.

See "Sir F. Head; a Narrative;" "Edinburgh Review" for April, 1847; "London Magazine" for October, 1826.

Head, (Sir GEORGE,) a brother of the preceding, was born near Rochester in 1782. He served in the army in the Peninsula from 1809 to 1814, when he was ordered to Canada and Nova Scotia. After his return to England he published "Forest Scenes and Incidents in the Wilds of North America," (1829,) and several other books of travel. In 1849 appeared his "Rome: a Tour of Many Days," said to be a standard work. He was made a knight in 1831. Died in 1855.

Healy, (JAMES AUGUSTINE,) D.D., an American bishop, born near Macon, Georgia, April 6, 1830. He graduated at Holy Cross College, Worcester, Massachusetts, and held Roman Catholic pastorates in Boston. In 1875 he was consecrated Bishop of Portland, Maine.

Hēa'pў, written also Heaphy, (THOMAS,) an English portrait-painter, born about 1775; died in 1835.

Hearne, hęrn, (SAMUEL,) an English traveller, born in London in 1745, was for several years a midshipman in the royal navy. Having entered the service of the Hudson Bay Company, he was sent in 1769 on an expedition to discover a Northwest passage, and was the first European who penetrated to the ocean north of America. Of this journey an account was published in 1795. Died in 1792.

Hearne, (THOMAS,) an eminent English antiquary and collater of manuscripts, was born at White Waltham, Berkshire, in 1678. He became assistant librarian of the Bodleian Library, Oxford, in 1712; but, being a zealous Jacobite, he refused to take the oath to George I., and lost his office. He published accurate editions, with annotations, of many old works, among which are Livy's "History," (1708,) Spelman's "Life of Alfred the Great," (1710,) Leland's "Itinerary," (9 vols., 1710,) and Camden's "Annals," (3 vols., 1717.) He is introduced in Pope's "Dunciad" under the name of "Wormius." Died in 1735.

See HUDDESFORD, "Life of Thomas Hearne," 1772.

Hearne, (THOMAS,) an English artist, born at Marshfield in 1744, was a landscape-painter in water-colours, and a topographical designer. Died in 1817.

Hēath, (BENJAMIN,) an English lawyer and scholar, who published in 1740 an "Essay on the Divine Existence, Unity, and Attributes," and in 1765 a "Revisal of Shakspeare's Text." Died in 1766.

He′bẹr, (REGINALD,) an excellent English poet and prelate, born at Malpas, in Cheshire, on the 21st of April, 1783. He was the second son of Reginald Heber, rector of Hodnet. In 1800 he entered Brazennose College, Oxford, where he produced in 1803 his beautiful prize poem "Palestine." He made a tour on the continent in 1805 and 1806, obtained the living of Hodnet in 1807, and married Amelia Shipley in 1809. In 1812 he published a volume of poems, containing translations from Pindar, and a poem entitled "Europe: Lines on the Present War." He afterwards composed more than fifty "Hymns adapted to the Weekly Church Service." "These hymns," says D. M. Moir, "have been by far the most popular of his productions, and deservedly so, for in purity and elevation of sentiment, in simple pathos and eloquent earnestness, it would be difficult to find anything superior to them in the range of lyric poetry." He was elected preacher to Lincoln's Inn in 1822, and appointed Bishop of Calcutta in January, 1823. After visiting many remote parts of his very extensive diocese, he died of apoplexy, at Trichinopoli, on the 3d of April, 1826, leaving a high reputation for genius, piety, and liberality. His journal of a "Journey through India from Calcutta to Bombay, with Notes on Ceylon," (2 vols., 1828,) is called by a writer in the "Quarterly Review" "one of the most delightful books in the language." "Independently of its moral attraction," says Lord Jeffrey, "we are induced to think it the most instructive and important publication that has ever been given to the world on the actual state and condition of our Indian empire." The same critic pays this high tribute to his character: "Learned, polished, and dignified he was undoubtedly; yet far more conspicuously kind, humble, tolerant, and laborious;—zealous for his church, too, and not forgetful of his station; but remembering it more for the duties than for the honours that were attached to it, and infinitely more zealous for the religious improvement and for the happiness of his fellow-creatures of every tongue, faith, and complexion; indulgent to all errors and infirmities; liberal in the best and truest sense of the word; humbly and conscientiously diffident of his own excellent judgment and never-failing charity."

Heber, (RICHARD,) a bibliomaniac and an excellent classical scholar, a half-brother of the preceding, was born in Westminster in 1773. He was educated at Oxford. In 1804 he inherited his father's estate at Hodnet, and represented the University of Oxford in Parliament from 1821 to 1826. He indulged an extravagant passion for collecting books, on which he is said to have spent about £180,000. He owned large libraries in London, Oxford, Paris, Antwerp, Ghent, Hodnet, and other places. He edited Silius Italicus and Claudian in 1792. Died in 1833. Sir Walter Scott dedicated to him the sixth canto of "Marmion."

Hĕb′ẹr-dẹn, (WILLIAM,) an eminent physician, born in London in 1710, was educated at Cambridge. In 1748 he began the practice of medicine in London, in which he acquired a high reputation. In 1750 he became a Fellow of the Royal Society, to whose "Transactions" he contributed. He was reputed one of the best classical scholars of his time. His greatest work, "Medical Commentaries," (1802,) was written in elegant Latin. His moral character was excellent. Died in 1801. His son, WILLIAM HEBERDEN, M.D., wrote a "Treatise on the Increase and Decrease of Different Diseases," (1801.)

Heberer, hā′bẹh-rẹr, (MICHAEL,) a German traveller, born in Baden about 1550. He passed about three years as a captive and slave in Egypt and Turkey, and published a Narrative of his adventures. Died in 1610.

Hébert, *h*à′bair′, (ANTOINE AUGUSTE ERNEST,) a French historical painter, born at Grenoble in 1817, was a pupil of David of Angers. He gained the first grand prize in 1839 for his picture of "The Cup found in the Sack of Benjamin." Among his works, which are admired for vigour of expression, are "Tasso in Prison," "The Malaria," (1850,) and "Les Filles d'Alvito," (1855.) He became commander of the legion of honour in 1874.

Hébert, (JACQUES RENÉ,) a French demagogue, born at Alençon in 1755, came to Paris when quite young, and was a desperate adventurer when the Revolution began. He gained notoriety by editing a scurrilous Jacobin paper named "Père Duchêne." Hébert and Chaumette were the authors of the atheistic festivals of Reason. Having been proscribed by Robespierre and Danton and charged with a conspiracy to massacre the Convention, he was executed in March, 1794.

Hébert, (MICHEL PIERRE ALEXIS,) a French advocate, born at Granville (Manche) in 1799; died in 1887.

Hébert, (PAUL O.,) an American general in the Confederate service, born in Louisiana. He served in Mexico in 1847, became Governor of Louisiana in 1854, and was made a brigadier-general in 1861. Died August 29, 1880.

Hebra, von, fon hā′brȧ, (FERDINAND,) an Austrian physician, born at Brunn, Moravia, in 1816. He graduated in 1841 at Vienna, where he became professor of dermatology. Among his chief works are "Atlas of Skin Diseases," (1876,) and "Text-Book of Skin Diseases." Upon diseases of the skin he was for many years recognized as the highest authority. Died August 5, 1880.

Hébrail, *h*à′brȧl′ or *h*à′brȧ′yẹ, (JACQUES,) a French bibliographer, born at Castelnaudary in 1716. He published "La France littéraire," (2 vols., 1769,) which is praised for accuracy. Died about 1800.

Hécart, *h*à′kȧr′, (GABRIEL ANTOINE JOSEPH,) a French littérateur, born at Valenciennes in 1755; died in 1838.

Hecatæus, hĕk-ạ-tee′us, [Gr. Ἑκαταῖος; Fr. HÉCATÉE, hà′kȧ′tà′,] OF ABDE′RA, a Greek historian, who lived about 330 B.C. He wrote a work on the Hyperboreans, and another on Egypt. Fragments of these are extant.

Hecatæus OF MI-LE′TUS, son of Hegesander, lived about 500 B.C. He was an eminent geographer, and one of the earliest Greek historians. Like Herodotus, he travelled in Egypt and other countries to obtain materials for history. His works were highly esteemed by the ancients.

See KLAUSEN, "De Vita et Scriptis Hecatæi;" C. MÜLLER, "De Vita et Scriptis Hecatæi."

Hecate, hĕk′ạ-te or hĕk′ạt, [Ἑκάτη,] in Greek mythology, was the daughter of Perses and Asteria. She is first mentioned by Hesiod, and appears to have been unknown in the age of Homer. Her attributes were various and apparently contradictory: she was said to dispense blessings and avert misfortunes, and was also described as a cruel infernal deity, presiding over magic and nocturnal incantations. She was represented with a hideous aspect, having her head surrounded with serpents, and infernal dogs howling around her.

Hec′a-ton, [Gr. Ἑκάτων,] a Greek Stoic philosopher, born at Rhodes, lived in the first century after Christ.

Hecht, hĕKt, (CHRISTIAN,) a German philologist and Lutheran divine, born at Halle in 1696; died in 1748.

Heck, van, vȧn hĕk, (JAN,) an excellent Flemish painter of landscapes, flowers, and fruit, born near Oudenarde about 1625. He worked in Rome and Antwerp. Died after 1660.

Heck, van der, vän der hĕk, (NIKLAAS,) a Dutch painter of Alkmaar, was born about 1580. He excelled in landscape and history, was a good colorist, and skilful in chiaroscuro. Died in 1638.

Heck, von. See HEGIUS.

Heckel, hĕk'ĕl, (JOHANN FRIEDRICH,) a German philologist, born at Gera about 1640; died in 1715.

Hecker, hĕk'kẹr, (AUGUST FRIEDRICH,) a German physician and medical writer, born near Halle in 1763; died in 1811.

Hecker, (FRIEDRICH KARL FRANZ,) a German radical politician and lawyer, born in Baden in 1811. After the revolution of 1848–49 he emigrated to the United States, and settled at Belleville, Illinois. Died in 1881.

Heck'ẹr, (ISAAC THOMAS,) an American theologian, born in New York in 1819. He became superior of the Paulist Fathers. He published "Questions of the Soul," (1855,) "Aspirations of Nature," "Catholicity in the United States," etc. Died December 22, 1888.

Hecker, (JUSTUS FRIEDRICH KARL,) son of August Friedrich, noticed above, was born at Erfurt in 1795. He published "The Black Death in the Fourteenth Century," and other medical treatises. Died in 1850.

Heckewelder, hĕk'ẹh-wĕl'dẹr, (Rev. JOHN,) a Moravian missionary, born in Bedford, England, in 1743, was employed many years among the Delaware Indians. He wrote an interesting, but rather flattering, account of the "History, Manners, and Customs of the Indian Nations," (1819.) "His account," according to General Cass, "is pure unmixed panegyric." Died at Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, January 21, 1823.

See E. RONDTHALER, "Life of J. Heckewelder," Philadelphia, 1847.

Heckscher, hĕk'shẹr, (JOHANN GUSTAV MORITZ,) a German politician, born at Hamburg in 1797. As a member of the Parliament of Frankfort, he voted for the Archduke John as vicar of the empire, and was appointed by him minister of justice and of foreign affairs in 1848. Died at Vienna, April 7, 1865.

Hecquet, *h*ā'kā', (PHILIPPE,) an eminent French physician, born at Abbeville in 1661. In 1688 he began to practise at Port-Royal, where he adopted habits of rigid abstinence and other austerities, to which he adhered to the end of his life. In 1697 he became a member of the Faculty of Paris, who employed him as professor of materia medica. He advocated the free use of the lancet, and wrote numerous professional treatises, one of which is called "Novus Medicinæ Conspectus," (1722.) It is said that Hecquet was the prototype of "Doctor Sangrado" in "Gil Blas." He was sometimes called "the French Hippocrates." Died in 1737.

See SAINT-MARC, "Vie de P. Hecquet;" "Biographie Médicale."

Hec'tọr, [Gr. Ἕκτωρ; It. ETTORE, ĕt-to'rà,] a famous Trojan hero, the eldest son of Priam and Hecuba, was the most valiant defender of Troy when that city was besieged by the Greeks. His character is one of the most admirable conceptions of Homer's genius. After performing prodigies of valour, fighting single combats with Ajax and Diomed, and slaying Patroclus, he was killed by Achilles.

Hedge, (FREDERICK HENRY,) D.D., a distinguished scholar and Unitarian divine, born at Cambridge, Massachusetts, December 12, 1805. He studied in Germany; after his return he graduated, in 1825, at Harvard, where also he was a student in divinity. He officiated for some years in West Cambridge; and in 1835 he removed to Bangor, Maine. In 1847 he visited Europe a second time, and on his return was settled for a few years in Providence, Rhode Island. He was invited in 1856 to take the pastoral charge of the Unitarian church at Brookline, Massachusetts. In 1857 he was chosen professor of ecclesiastical history at the divinity school of Harvard. The same year he became editor of the "Christian Examiner," to which he made many valuable contributions. Of his numerous publications the most important are "The Prose Writers of Germany," (1848,) "Reason in Religion," (1865,) "The Primeval World of Hebrew Tradition," (1870,) "Hours with German Classics," (1886,) and "Martin Luther and Other Essays," (1888.) Dr. Hedge was distinguished for his varied learning and high literary culture, as well as for strength, originality, and acuteness of intellect; and his writings are destined, we doubt not, to a permanent place in his country's literature. Died August 21, 1890.

Hedge, (LEVI,) the father of the preceding, born at Warwick, Massachusetts, in 1767, was for many years professor of logic and metaphysics at Harvard. His "System of Logic" (1818) had a great success, and was translated into German. Died in 1843.

Hedg'eē, (Sir CHARLES,) an English politician, graduated at Oxford in 1675. In 1700 he was appointed one of the chief secretaries of state. About the same time he was returned to Parliament, in which he sat many years. The Whigs dismissed him from the office of secretary in 1706. Died in 1714.

Hedin, hā-deen', (SVEN ANDERS,) a Swedish medical writer, born in Småland in 1750, was a pupil of Linnæus. He became first physician to the King of Sweden in 1798. He wrote, besides other works, a "Eulogy on Linnæus," (1808.) Died in 1821.

Hedio, hā'de-o, (KASPAR,) a German Protestant divine, born at Ettlingen, in Baden, in 1494. He became about 1520 court preacher at Mentz, whence he removed to Strasburg in 1523. He preached in the cathedral of this city, and made many converts. He wrote a work on the history of his times, called "Chronicon Germanicum," (1530,) and other works. Died in 1552.

Hefele, von, fon hā'fẹh-lẹh, (KARL JOSEPH,) an eminent German bishop, born at Unterkochen, in Würtemberg, March 15, 1809. He graduated at Tübingen in 1834, and in 1840 was called to the professorship of church history in the Catholic faculty of that university. He was consecrated Bishop of Rottenburg in 1869, and though he voted against papal infallibility at the Vatican Council he afterwards submitted. His principal work is the masterly "Conciliengeschichte," ("History of the Church Councils," 7 vols., 1855–74.) He has also published various other learned works, principally relating to church history, patrology, liturgy, etc.

Heffter, hĕf'tẹr, (AUGUST WILHELM,) a German jurist, born at Schweinitz in 1796; died January 5, 1880.

Heffter, (MORITZ WILHELM,) a brother of the preceding, was the author of a treatise "On the Religion of the Greeks, Romans, Ancient Egyptians, and Indians," and other works. He was born in 1792, and died at Brandenburg, July 8, 1873.

Hefner-Alteneck, von, fon hĕf'nẹR ăl'tẹh-nĕk, (JAKOB HEINRICH,) a German art-historian, born at Aschaffenburg, May 20, 1811. He has written much upon the art of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance. His son FRIEDRICH (born in 1845) is noted as an inventor of apparatus for electric lighting.

Hegel, hā'gẹl, (GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH,) one of the most eminent philosophers of the German school of metaphysics, was born at Stuttgart in 1770. At the age of eighteen he entered the University of Tübingen as student of theology. Here he formed an intimate acquaintance and friendship with Schelling, although the two friends became subsequently rival candidates for the leadership of German philosophy. On leaving the university he engaged as a private teacher, first at Berne and afterwards at Frankfort-on-the-Main. He became in 1801 a lecturer in the University of Jena. In the same year appeared his first important work, "On the Difference between the Philosophical Systems of Fichte and Schelling." In 1806 he became professor-extraordinary of philosophy at Jena; but, that town having soon after been taken by the French, he was thrown out of employment. For some time he edited a political paper at Bamberg. Here was published (1807) his "Phænomenology," the first part of his "System of Knowledge." In 1808 he was appointed rector of the gymnasium at Nuremberg, where he finished his "Science of Logic," ("Wissenschaft der Logik," in 3 vols., 1812–16.) In 1811 he married Marie von Tucher, a lady of strong religious convictions and rare moral virtues. He was devotedly attached to her, and their union was eminently a happy one. He was called in 1816 to the chair of philosophy at Heidelberg, and while here published his "Encyclopædia of the Philosophical Sciences," in which his whole scheme of philosophy is comprised. In 1818 he succeeded at Berlin to the professorship of philosophy left vacant by the death of Fichte. He died of cholera in 1831. Soon after his death his works were collected and published at Berlin, in 18 vols., (1832–41.)

The philosophy of Hegel is regarded by his followers as by far the most logical, complete, and comprehensive of all the pantheistic systems. With our narrow limits it would be impossible to give even a satisfactory outline of his scheme. Suffice it to say that it is generally regarded as the completion of the great philosophic edifice of which Kant had laid the foundations, and to which Fichte and Schelling had contributed important materials. One of the most striking peculiarities of Hegel's philosophic system is the complete identification of logic with metaphysics. The Hegelians have been divided into three classes, (according to the nomenclature of the French legislative assemblies,) namely, the right, the centre, and the left. The right maintain that the Hegelian philosophy is perfectly harmonious with orthodox Christianity: in other words, it is Christianity viewed in its philosophic aspects. The left, represented by such writers as Strauss, Michelet, Ruge, etc., for the most part deny the personality of God, as well as the truths of Christian revelation, though they differ as to whether the universe is purely material or spiritual in its essence. The centre (it is scarcely necessary to say) occupy middle ground: here belong Rosenkrantz, Vatke, Gans, etc.

"Hegel's system, [of philosophy,]" says Dr. Hedge, "has produced a profound impression upon the German mind. The theological and philosophical controversies of the day rage around it. It is reputed to be the most comprehensive and analytic of pantheistic schemes. Its author and some of his disciples have asserted that it is the same system, in the form of philosophy, which Christianity gives us in the form of faith. But its present position is that of hostility to Christianity." ("Prose Writers of Germany.")

Hegel, (KARL,) a son of the preceding, was born at Nuremberg, June 7, 1813. He held professorships of history at Rostock and Erlangen. His principal work is a "History of the Town-System of Italy." He also wrote much upon the early history of Germany and its cities. Died November 26, 1891.

He-ge'mon [Ἡγήμων] of Thasos, an Athenian comic poet, flourished about 450 B.C. Aristotle attributes the invention of parody to him.

Hegemon, an Athenian orator, who favoured the Macedonian party. Died in 317 B.C.

Hegendorf, hā'gẹn-dorf', (CHRISTOPH,) a German philologist, and friend of Luther, born at Leipsic in 1500; died in 1540.

He-ge'sĭ-as, [Ἡγησίας,] a Greek orator and historian, was born at Magnesia, and lived about 300 or 250 B.C. He wrote a "History of Alexander the Great," which appears to have had little merit. Several ancient critics censure the inflated style of his oratory, which was one of the first examples of the "Asiatic" style.

See VOSSIUS, "De Historicis Græcis."

Hegesias, a Cyrenaic philosopher, who is supposed to have lived about 300 B.C., was a disciple of Aristippus. He founded a new sect, called Hegesiacs, maintained that happiness is impossible, and that death is preferable to life. His doctrines induced so many to commit suicide that Ptolemy closed his school.

Heiberg, hī'bẽRG, (JOHAN LUDWIG,) a popular Danish dramatist and poet, born at Copenhagen in 1791. He produced in 1811 a drama called "Tycho Brahe's Prediction," and passed several years in France, from which he introduced the vaudeville into Denmark. Among his successful dramas of that kind are "Solomon and the Hatter," (1826,) "The Elves' Hill," "The Soul after Death," and "The Danes in Paris," (1833.) He received in 1829 the title of royal dramatic poet and translator. He published several metaphysical works, among which is "The Significance of the Philosophy of the Present Day," ("Ueber die Bedeutung der Philosophie der Gegenwart," 1833.) His poetical works were published in 9 vols., (1833–41.) Died in Paris in 1860.

He was a large contributor to "Appleton's Cyclopædias," and to the New York "Nation." He was remarkable for his linguistic attainments as well as for his general knowledge. He published "Historical Poetry of the Ancient Hebrews," (2 vols.: vol. i., 1879; vol. ii., 1880.) Died May 10, 1888. His son LOUIS (born 1851) is known as a geographer and chronologist, and author of a very useful "Historical Reference-Book," (1884.) Another son, ANGELO, (born 1853,) is professor of invertebrate palæontology in the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia; and a nephew, FABIAN FRANKLIN, is an able mathematician of Johns Hopkins University.

Heilprin, (PHINEAS MENDEL,) a Jewish scholar, born at Lublin, Russian Poland, in November, 1801. He became a manufacturer and merchant of Petrikau, and was a close student of the Talmud, as well as of the Greek and recent German philosophers. His position among the Jewish thinkers was that of a conservative reformer. In 1842 he removed to Hungary, in consequence of his dislike for the oppressive measures of the Russian government. After the failure of the revolution of 1848 he removed from Hungary, and in 1859 came to the United States. Died at Washington, D.C., January 30, 1863. His writings (all in Hebrew) include a number of polemical works, relating to the reform movement among the Jews.

Heim, hīm, (ERNST LUDWIG,) a German physician and medical writer, born in 1747, practised in Berlin. Died in 1834.

Heim, ȧN, (FRANÇOIS JOSEPH,) a French historical painter, born at Belfort (Haut-Rhin) in 1787. He gained the grand prize in 1807, went to Rome, with a pension, afterwards worked in Paris, and was chosen a member of the Institute in 1829. Among his works are "The Clemency of Titus," (1819,) "The Defeat of the Cimbri by Marius," (1853,) and portraits of many eminent men. He had good talents, but his works were hastily executed. Died at Paris October 2, 1865.

Heim, (GEORG CHRISTOPH,) a naturalist, brother of Ernst Ludwig, noticed above, was born at Solz in 1743. He published a "German Flora," ("Deutsche Flora," 2 vols., 1799–1800.) Died in 1807.

Heim, (JOHANN LUDWIG,) a German geologist, brother of the preceding, was born at Solz in 1741. He wrote a "Treatise on the Geology of the Mountains of Thuringia," (6 vols., 1796–1812.) Died in 1819.

Heimbach, hīm′bȧK, (CARL WILHELM ERNST,) a German jurist, born at Merseburg in 1803; died in 1865.

Heimburg, hīm′bo͝orG, [Lat. HEIMBUR′GIUS,] (GREGOR,) an eminent German jurist, was born at Würzburg. At the Council of Bâle he opposed the pretensions of the pope, and in 1431 settled at Nuremberg. He died in 1472, and left several legal works, which exhibit an acute intellect and a noble spirit of freedom.

Heimdall, hīm′dȧl, or Heimdallr, [etymology uncertain,] a god in the Northern mythology, regarded as the watchman of the Æsir, and the warder of heaven, is called a son of Odin, but on the maternal side is descended from the Jötun race. He drinks mead in his bright hall, called Himinbjörg, ("Heaven's Castle,") at the bridge-head where the rainbow (Bifröst*) reaches heaven. He sleeps less than a bird, and sees by night, as well as by day, more than a hundred leagues around him. His hearing is so acute that he can hear the grass grow in the meadows of the earth, and the wool on the back of the sheep. When he blows upon his trumpet, called Gjallar-horn, (or Gjaller-horn,) it is heard through all the worlds. His teeth are said to be of gold, and he has a horse with a golden mane. It is not improbable that the name of this god may be some change or corruption of Heimdellingr, ("home of dawn,") as the dawn seems to keep still watch in heaven for the approach of day, and may well be said to ride on a horse with a golden mane. The original fable of Heimdall, if it ever had any distinct allegorical significance, would seem to have been not a little confused by incongruous additions, made probably at a later period.

Hein or Heyn, hīn, (PIETER,) a brave Dutch admiral, born at Delftshaven in 1570, was the son of a common sailor. In 1628 he captured in the Bay of Matanzas a Spanish fleet, with a rich cargo of silver. For this exploit he was made a vice-admiral. In 1629 he defeated the French near Dunkirk, and lost his life in the action.

Heine, hī'nẹh, (HEINRICH,) a celebrated German poet and author, of Jewish descent, born at Dusseldorf, Dec. 13, 1799. He studied law at Bonn, Berlin, and Göttingen, and took his degree at Göttingen university. His first poems appeared in 1822, and were followed by the tragedies of "Almansor" and "Radcliff," (1823.) In 1825 he renounced the Jewish faith, and professed Christianity; but he subsequently became an avowed unbeliever. His "Pictures of Travel" ("Reisebilder," 4 vols., 1831) were received with great favour, and were afterwards translated by him into French, under the title of "Tableaux de Voyages." His other principal works are the "Book of Songs," ("Buch der Lieder," 1827,) "Contributions to the History of Recent Belles-Lettres in Germany," ("Beiträge zur Geschichte der neuern schönen Literatur in Deutschland," 2 vols., 1833,) "Der Salon," (4 vols., 1835,) "The Romantic School," ("Die Romantische Schule," 1836,) and the poem of "Atta Troll, a Summer Night's Dream," (1847.) Heine had removed in 1831 to Paris, where he married a French lady, and where he resided till his death. About 1848 his health became very much impaired, and he lost his sight; but he still employed himself in literary composition, with the assistance of an amanuensis. Among the works he produced at this period are the "Romanzero," (1851,) "Doctor Faust," (1851,) "Das Buch des Lazarus," (1854,) and the "New Spring," ("Neuer Frühling," 1855.) After an illness of eight years, a great part of which time had been passed in extreme suffering, he died February 17, 1856. Several years before his death he had renounced infidelity. The spirit of satire seems to have been innate in Heine; but it is not in satire alone that he excels. For a certain simplicity and grace of style, as well as for an exquisite vein of humour, which is occasionally lighted up with flashes of the most brilliant wit, Heine has no superior among the poets or prose writers of Germany. His prose is remarkable for its transparent beauty, and is perhaps unequalled by that of any other German author except Goethe.

"Heine," says a critic in the "Westminster Review" for January, 1856, "adds to Teutonic imagination, sensibility, and humour, an amount of esprit that would make him brilliant among the most brilliant Frenchmen. He is a surpassing lyric poet, who has uttered our feelings for us in delicious songs; an artist in prose literature, who has shown even more completely than Göthe the possibilities of German prose."

Heineccius, hi-nĕk'se-ŭs, or Heinecke, hī'nĕk-kẹh, (JOHANN GOTTLIEB,) an eminent German jurist, born at Eisenberg in September, 1681. He became professor of philosophy at Halle in 1713, obtained a chair of law there in 1720, and removed to Franeker in 1723. He afterwards lectured a few years at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, was appointed professor of law at Halle in 1733, and published numerous works, which were esteemed as high authority. He invented a new method of teaching jurisprudence, called "the axiomatic." Among his principal works are "Elements of Civil Law according to the Order of the Institutes," ("Elementa Juris civilis secundum Ordinem Institutionum," 1725,) "Elements of Civil Law according to the Order of the Pandects," ("Elementa Juris civilis secundum Ordinem Pandectarum," 1728,) "Elements of the Law of Nature and Nations," ("Elementa Juris Naturæ et Gentium," 1730,) and a "History of Roman and German Law," (in Latin, 1733.) Died in 1741.

Heineccius or Heinecke, (JOHANN MICHAEL,) a writer and eloquent preacher, brother of the preceding, was born at Eisenberg in 1674. He became pastor at Halle about 1710. He published several antiquarian works. Died in 1722.

Heinecke. See HEINECCIUS.

Heinecken, hī'nĕk-kẹn, (CHRISTIAN HEINRICH,) known as "the Boy of Lubeck," born in that city in 1721, was a brother of Karl Heinrich von Heinecken, noticed below. He was one of the most remarkable instances of mental precocity on record. At the age of two years he was well versed in the history of the Bible, in his third year learned French and Latin, and in his fourth studied ecclesiastical history. He died in 1725.

Heinecken, von, fon hī'nĕk-kẹn, or Heinecke, (KARL HEINRICH,) a German writer on art, born at Lubeck in 1706. He published in 1755 a splendid work entitled "Collection of Prints from the Most Celebrated Pictures of the Royal Gallery at Dresden," and "Dictionnaire des Artistes, etc. dont nous avons des Estampes," (4 vols., 1778–90, unfinished.) Died in 1791.

Heinicke, hī'nik-kẹh, (SAMUEL,) born at Weissenfels in 1729, was the founder of a system of instruction for deaf-mutes. About 1778 he established at Leipsic the first institution for the education of the deaf and dumb in Germany, of which he continued director till his death, in 1790. He published a treatise "On the Dispositions of Deaf-Mutes," and other works.

Heinrich, hīn'rik, (KARL FRIEDRICH,) a learned German critic, born in the duchy of Saxe-Gotha in 1774. He was successively professor of Greek and of eloquence at the Universities of Kiel and Bonn. He edited the works of Juvenal and Persius, and Cicero's "De Re Publica," and was the author of "Epimenides aus Creta," an essay on Epimenides and his works, which is highly esteemed. Died in 1838.

Heinrich der Glichezare, hīn'rik dĕr glik'ẹt-sā'rẹh,

* The name Bifröst, from bifa, to "tremble," and röst, a "road" or "way," signifying the "trembling or swinging way," was applied to the rainbow, perhaps on account of its apparent want of stability, or its inconstancy. Its curved form may have suggested the idea of Heimdall's great horn, (the Gjallar-horn, i.e. the "yelling or loud-sounding horn,") which he blows on the approach of any extraordinary danger. It was actually believed that at the "end of the rainbow" a golden treasure was hidden, and that golden money fell from the bow.

Heinsius, hīn′se-ûs, (ANTOON,) an eminent Dutch statesman, born in 1641, was elected in 1689 grand pensionary of Holland, and re-elected at the end of each successive term of five years until his death. He performed an important part in the political affairs of his time, especially in the coalition against Louis XIV. of France. Heinsius, Prince Eugene, and Marlborough formed a triumvirate which directed the affairs of the allied powers. He enjoyed in a high degree the confidence of William III. of England, to whom he rendered great services. Among the allies he was the last to assent to the peace with Louis XIV. He was an accomplished negotiator, reserved but polite in manner, simple and moderate in his way of life. Died in 1720.

Heinsius, (DANIEL,) a distinguished Dutch scholar and linguist, born at Ghent in 1580, studied at the Hague and at Leyden, where he became the pupil and friend of Scaliger. About 1600 he was appointed Latin and Greek tutor, and in 1606 professor of history and politics, in the University of Leyden. His reputation for learning was such that several sovereigns invited him to their courts; but he declined to leave his native land. Gustavus Adolphus conferred on him the dignity of privy councillor, and the States of Holland appointed him their historiographer. In 1618 he officiated as secretary of the Synod of Dort. His Latin poems, published in 1602, were admired by his contemporaries; but his reputation now rests chiefly on his editions of Aristotle, Horace, Livy, Ovid, and other Greek and Latin classics. He wrote also Latin orations, Dutch verses, and Greek verses. "Grotius," says Hallam, "had the reputation of writing with spirit and elegance; but he is excelled by Heinsius, whose elegies may be ranked high in modern Latin." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") Died in 1655.

Heinsius, (NIKLAAS,) an eminent philologist, a son of the preceding, was born at Leyden in July, 1620. After he had visited the principal seats of learning in Europe, and had become distinguished as a scholar and critic, he accepted in 1649 an invitation from Christina, Queen of Sweden, and remained in her service about five years. In 1654 he was appointed minister of the United Provinces at the court of Sweden. His leisure hours were passed in the cultivation of poetry and in classic studies. In 1667 he was sent on an embassy to the court of Russia, from which he returned in 1671. He published editions of Claudian, (1650,) Ovid, (1652,) Virgil, (1664,) and Valerius Flaccus, (1680.) He also wrote several Latin poems, (1666,) which are commended for purity and elegance. Died in 1681.

Hĕl or He′la, [Icelandic pron. hā′la; from hilan, to "conceal,"] in the Norse mythology, the goddess of death, and the queen of the world of shades. She is represented as the offspring of Loki and the giantess Angurboda. Soon after her birth, the Æsir, fearing her growing power, cast her down into Niflheim,* (the "home or habitation of fogs or mist,") and gave her the rule over nine realms or worlds, to the nine entrances of which Gray makes allusion in the following lines:

"Down the yawning steep he rode
That leads to Hela's drear abode,
Till full before his fearless eyes
The portals nine of Hell arise."

* Nifl is related etymologically to the Greek νεφέλη, Latin nebula, (German Nebel,) a "cloud" or "mist."

Her hall is called Eliudnir, said to signify the "wide place of clouds or storms;" her dish is Hunger, and her knife Starvation, (Sult.) Under one of the three roots of the great life-tree Yggdrasil, in Niflheim, is the fountain Hvergelmir, from which flow the streams of Hell. In this fountain dwells the malignant serpent or monster Nidhögg, who constantly gnaws at the root of the tree of life. (See NIDHÖGG.) As, on the one hand, all those men who fell bravely in battle belonged either to Odin or Freyia and were brought by the Valkyries to Valhalla, so, on the other, all those who died of sickness or old age belonged to Hela, and were inexorably doomed to dwell in some one of her gloomy realms.

"And he beheld spread round him Hela's realm,
The plains of Niflheim, where dwell the dead,
And heard the thunder of the streams of Hell.
For near the wall the river of Roaring flows,
Outmost; the others near the centre run,—
The Storm, the Abyss, the Howling, and the Pain,
* * * * * *
And from the dark flocked up the shadowy tribes,
Women, and infants, and young men who died
Too soon for fame, with white ungraven shields;
And old men known to glory, but their star
Betrayed them, and of wasting age they died,
Not wounds; yet dying they their armour wore,
And now have chief regard in Hela's realm."

The aspect of Hela herself is usually represented as peculiarly grim and horrid, the upper part of her body being livid, as from congealed blood. In one of the fables of the Edda, however, she makes her appearance as a toothless old woman. (See THOR.)

He published "A System of Constitutional Justice," (1856–57,) "The State and Society," (3 vols., 1861–63,) "Principles of General Public Law," (1868,) "The Constitution of the German Empire," (1872,) etc. Died April 18, 1882.

Hele, hāl, or Hāles, sometimes written D'Héle, (THOMAS,) an English dramatic writer, born in Gloucestershire in 1740. He settled in Paris about 1770, and learned to write in French with ease and elegance. He produced, in French, several successful comedies, among which are "The Judgment of Midas," (1778,) and "The Jealous Lover." Died about 1780.

Hĕl'en, [Gr. Ἑλένη; Lat. HEL'ENA; Fr. HÉLÈNE, à'lăn'; It. ELENA, à-lā'nā,] a Grecian princess, celebrated for her transcendent beauty, was the daughter of Leda and the Spartan king Tyndarus, or, according to other authorities, of Leda and Jupiter. At an early age her hand was sought by some of the most renowned princes of Greece, among whom were Ulysses, Ajax, Diomedes, and Menelaus. At the suggestion of Ulysses, Tyndarus bound the suitors by an oath to submit to the choice which Helen should make, and to unite in her defence if any attempt should be made to carry her away from her husband. She selected Menelaus, from whom, after a short union, she was abducted by Paris, son of Priam, upon which the Greek kings declared war against Troy. After the death of Paris, Helen married his brother Deiphobus, whom, after she became reconciled to Menelaus, she betrayed into the hands of the latter. The accounts of her death are various: the most probable is that she was put to death by Polyxo, Queen of Rhodes, whose husband had been killed at Troy.

Hel'e-na, SAINT, [Fr. SAINTE-HÉLÈNE, săn'tà'lăn'; It. SANT' ELENA, sânt-à-lā'nâ,] mother of the emperor Constantine, was born of a humble family at Drepanum, in Bithynia, about 250 A.D. She became the wife of Constantius Chlorus, who, having been raised to the rank of Cæsar in 292 A.D., divorced her in order to marry Theodora. The accession of Constantine to the throne restored her to prosperity and honour. About 325 she made a pilgrimage to Palestine, where she built the church of the Holy Sepulchre and that of the Nativity. Died in 327.

Helena, daughter of Constantine the Great, was married at Milan in 355 A.D. to her first-cousin Julian, who had just become a Cæsar and was afterwards Emperor of Rome. She died at Vienne, in Gaul, in 359.

Hel'e-nus, [Gr. Ἕλενος; Fr. HÉLÉNUS, à'là'nüs',] a son of Priam and Hecuba, was celebrated as a soothsayer. Having been captured by the Greeks, he declared that Troy could not be taken unless Philoctetes would repair to the siege. After the fall of Troy he fell to the share of Pyrrhus, who gave him Andromache in marriage and left him at his death a portion of his kingdom.

Hell, hĕl, (MAXIMILIAN,) an able Hungarian astrono-mer, born at Schemnitz in 1720, became a Jesuit about 1738. From 1756 to 1792 he held the official position of astronomer and director of the Observatory at Vienna. He distinguished himself by a successful observation of the transit of Venus which he made in Lapland in June, 1769, and of which he published an account, "De Transitu Veneris," etc., (1770.) He published annually from 1757 to 1786 "Ephemerides," which were esteemed. Among his works (in Latin) are a "Treatise on the Parallax of the Sun," (1773,) and "Methodus Astronomica sine Usu Quadrantis vel Sectoris," (1774.) Died in 1792.

Hel-lā'dĭ-us, a Greek grammarian, born in Egypt, lived about 325 A.D. He composed, in Iambic verse, a "Chrestomathie," of which some fragments are preserved.

Helladius, a Greek grammarian, born at Alexandria, lived in the fifth century after Christ.

Helladius, (ALEXANDER,) a Greek of Thessaly, who lived about 1700. He wrote a curious Latin work, entitled "The Present State of the Greek Church," published in 1714 at Altorf, Germany, where he then resided.

Hel-la-nī'cus [Ἑλλάνικος] OF MITYLENE, an early Greek prose writer and historian, was born probably about 495 B.C. He was the best or most distinguished writer of the class called logographers. Among his works were a "History of Argos," a "History of Attica," and a "History of Persia." Only small fragments of his writings are extant. He died about 410 B.C.

See PRELLER, "Dissertatio de Hellanico Lesbio Historico," 1840; C. MÜLLER, "De Hellanico."

Hel'le, [Gr. Ἕλλη,] a daughter of Athamas and Nephele. The poets relate that she was persecuted by her step-mother Ino, and was rescued by a golden-fleeced ram, on the back of which she rode through the air; but she fell into the sea, (since called Hellespont, or "sea of Helle,") and was drowned.

Hel'len, [Gr. Ἕλλην,] the mythical ancestor of the Helle'nes, or Greeks, was supposed to be a son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, and the father of Æolus, Dorus, and Xuthus. The name Hellenes was afterwards applied to the whole Greek nation.

Heller, hel'lẹr, (JOSEPH,) a German writer on art, born at Bamberg in 1798. He published a "Manual for Amateurs of Engravings," (3 vols., 1823–36,) "Documents (Beitrag) for the History of Art," (1828,) "The Life and Works of Albert Dürer," (1827–31,) and other works. Died in 1849.

Heller, (ROBERT,) a German author, born near Stolpen, November 24, 1812. He wrote many romances, books of travel, etc. Died at Hamburg, May 7, 1871.

Heller, hel'lẹr, (STEPHEN,) a Hungarian composer, born at Pesth in 1814, became a resident of Paris. His compositions for the piano are much admired in Germany and are regarded by some critics as equal to those of Mendelssohn. Died in 1888.

Helmersen, von, fon hĕl'mẹr-sĕn', (GREGOR,) a Russian geologist and traveller, born near Dorpat in 1803. Having explored Russia, Sweden, etc., he published, in 1831, "Observations on the Geology of the Southern Ural." Died in 1885.

Helmfeldt, hĕlm'fĕlt, (SIMON GRUNDEL,) BARON OF, a Swedish field-marshal, born at Stockholm in 1617, distinguished himself in the campaigns of Poland under Charles X. He was killed at the battle of Landscrona, in 1677.

Helmholtz, hĕlm'holts, (HERMANN LUDWIG FERDINAND,) an eminent German physiologist, mathematician, and natural philosopher, born at Potsdam in 1821. He became professor of physiology at Heidelberg in 1858, and wrote some able treatises on the relations of physical forces. One of these has been translated into English by Professor John Tyndall, under the title of "Essay on the Interaction of Natural Forces." Helmholtz stood in the foremost rank among the physiologists and natural philosophers of Europe. His writings upon sound and hearing are of special importance. He was a member of the Royal Societies of London and Edinburgh, and of the learned societies of the other principal capitals of Europe. Died September 8, 1894.

Helmich, hĕl'mĭk, (WERNER,) a Dutch Protestant minister, born at Utrecht about 1550, preached at Utrecht and Amsterdam, and promoted the Reformation in Holland. Died in 1608.

Helmold, hĕl'molt, [Lat. HELMOL'DUS,] a German historian and ecclesiastic, born near Lubeck, travelled as a missionary among the Slavonians. He was the author of a "Chronicon Slavorum," which, though rude in style, is valuable for its accuracy. Died about 1177.

Helmont, van, vȧn hĕl'mont, (FRANCIS MERCURIUS,) a physician, son of the following, born in Belgium in 1618, inherited his father's taste for the occult sciences, on which he wrote several treatises. He professed to believe in a universal remedy and the philosopher's stone, and pretended that he had discovered the original language. Died in 1699.

Helmont, van, (JAN BAPTISTA,) a famous chemist, physiologist, and visionary, was born at Brussels in 1577. He studied medicine, which he practised gratis, and had numerous disciples, though he was hostile to the doctrines of the Galenists. He seems to have been an honest enthusiast, infected with the delusions of alchemy, and to have spent much time and money in chemical experiments, by which he made important discoveries. "Van Helmont," says Dr. Hoefer, "is much superior to Paracelsus, whom he took in some measure as his model. He had the durable glory of revealing scientifically the existence of invisible, impalpable substances,—namely, gases." He was the first who used the word gas as the name of all elastic fluids except common air. He contributed to the progress of physiology by an experiment on a willow-tree, which he found to gain one hundred and sixty-four pounds, while the soil in which it grew lost only a few ounces. Among his works are one on the magnetic cure of wounds, ("De magnetica Vulnerum naturali Curatione," 1621,) and one on "The Origin of Medicine," etc., ("Ortus Medicinæ, id est Initia Physicæ inaudita," 1648.) He died near Vilvorde in 1644.

Helmont, van, (Lucas Gassel,) an able Flemish landscape-painter, who lived about 1595.

Helmont, van, (Matthew,) a Flemish painter of Antwerp, born in 1653, painted markets, shops, etc. with success. Died in 1726.

Helmont, van, (Segres Jacob,) an eminent Flemish painter of history, born at Antwerp in 1683, was a pupil of his father, Matthew. He worked at Brussels, and derived his subjects mostly from sacred history. Among his chief works are "The Sacrifice of Elijah," "Joseph Recognized by his Brethren," and "The Triumph of David." His manner is noble, his colour good, and his design correct. He was ranked among the greatest Flemish painters of his time. Died in 1726.

Helmsdorf, hĕlms'dorf, (Friedrich,) an able German landscape-painter, born at Magdeburg in 1784; died at Carlsruhe, January 26, 1852.

Héloise, ā'lo'ēz', Eloise, or Louise, a beautiful and renowned Frenchwoman, born at Paris about 1100, was a niece of Fulbert, canon of Notre-Dame. She was distinguished for her attainments in languages and philosophy, and became successively the pupil, mistress, and wife of Abelard. Soon after their marriage she entered the convent of Argenteuil, of which she became prioress. She afterwards acquired a high reputation for piety and devotion. Her letters, written in elegant Latin, and printed with those of Abelard, are the expressions of a noble and fervent spirit. Died in 1164. (See Abelard.)

Hel'per, (Hinton Rowan,) an American author, born in Davie county, North Carolina, December 27, 1829. He lived in California for a time, and wrote "The Land of Gold," (1855,) "The Impending Crisis of the South," (1857,) a work which produced a great sensation, "No-joque," (1867,) and "Negroes in Negroland," (1868.) He was (1861–67) consul at Buenos Ayres.

Helps, (Sir Arthur,) a popular English essayist and historian, born in 1813. He graduated at Cambridge in 1835, and produced in 1843 "Catherine Douglas, a Tragedy," in verse, which was received with favour. In 1847 he published, anonymously, a volume of dialogues on moral questions, entitled "Friends in Council: a Series of Readings and Discourses thereon," which was generally admired for graceful style and original insight. His next work was "Companions of my Solitude," (1851,) which a critic in "Blackwood's Magazine" considers "far the most interesting of all Mr. Helps's essays." Among his later works are "The Conquerors of the New World, and their Bondsmen," (2 vols., 1848–52,) a "History of the Spanish Conquest of America, and its Relations to the History of Slavery," (3 vols., 1855–57,) "Realmah, a Tale," and a "Life of Columbus," (1869.) "A true thinker, who has practical purpose in his thinking," says Ruskin, "and is sincere, as Plato, or Carlyle, or Helps, becomes in some sort a seer, and must be always of infinite use to his generation." He held for many years an office in the civil service, and became clerk or secretary of the privy council about 1860. Died March 7, 1875.

Hel'sham, (Richard,) professor of physic and natural philosophy in the University of Dublin. He was an intimate friend of Dean Swift. Died in 1738. His lectures on philosophy were published in 1739, and have been often reprinted.

Helst, van der, vän der hĕlst, (Bartholomew,) an excellent Dutch portrait-painter, born at Haarlem in 1613. He painted landscapes in his youth, but he afterwards confined himself mostly to portraits, and settled in Amsterdam. Among his works is a picture of the militia or trained bands, which is in the Stadt-House of Amsterdam, and which Sir Joshua Reynolds is said to have pronounced "the best picture of portraits in the world." Died about 1670.

Helvetius, hĕl-vee'she-us, [Fr. pron. ĕl'vā'se'üs',] (Claude Adrien,) a celebrated French author and philosopher, born in Paris in 1715, was the son of Jean Claude Adrien, noticed below, who destined him for financial pursuits. At the age of twenty-three he obtained, through the influence of the queen, a place as farmer-general, which was worth one hundred thousand crowns per annum. In 1751 he resigned this office, and married an accomplished lady named De Ligniville or Ligneville. He published in 1758 an ingenious metaphysical work, entitled "On the Mind," ("De l'Esprit,") which was condemned by the court, the Jesuits, and the bishops as the summary of the creed of the Encyclopædists, and was burned by order of Parliament, thus acquiring additional celebrity and a wider circulation. The author publicly apologized, and disclaimed any purpose to assail the Christian doctrines. He is admitted to have been generous, and his life and character appear to have been better than his writings, which, deriving all virtue from self-interest, and condemning as folly all actions proceeding from any higher motive, are in the highest degree demoralizing. He wrote a poem "On Happiness," and a treatise on "Man, his Faculties and his Education," (1772.) In 1765 he was an invited and honoured guest in the palace of Frederick the Great. Died in 1771.

Anne Catherine de Ligniville, (lĕn'ye'vĕl',) Madame Helvetius, the wife of the preceding, was born in Lorraine in 1719. After the death of her husband her house at Auteuil was the rendezvous of celebrated men, among whom were Dr. Franklin, Turgot, and Thomas Jefferson. Died in 1800.

Helvetius, hĕl-vee'she-us, (Jan,) a classical scholar and Latin poet of the eighteenth century, was born in Amsterdam. He described in elegant verses his travels in England, "Iter Britannicum," and wrote other works. Died about 1781.

Helvetius, (Jean Adrien,) a Dutch physician, born about 1660. He was present in Paris on a visit during the prevalence of dysentery, which he treated with such success that Louis XIV. urged him to divulge the remedy. He said it was ipecacuanha, and received from the king a present of one thousand louisd'ors. He settled in Paris, and became physician to the regent of the kingdom, the Duke of Orléans. He wrote several treatises on medicine. Died in 1727.

See "Biographie Médicale;" Moréri, "Dictionnaire Historique."

Helvetius, (Jean Claude Adrien,) son of the preceding, born in Paris in 1685, graduated as physician in 1708. Having given proof of his professional skill, he was in 1719 called to attend Louis XV., then an infant, whom he cured of a dangerous illness. After this he enjoyed the confidence of the royal family, and was made councillor of state, and first physician to the queen, Marie Leczinski. He was a member of the Academies of Sciences of Paris, Berlin, and London, and wrote several professional treatises, among which is a "Method of Curing the Principal Diseases," (1737.) Died in 1765.

Helvicus, hĕl-vee'kŭs, or Helwig, hĕl'wĭg, (Christoph,) an eminent German philologist, born near Frankfort in 1581. He could speak Latin, Greek, and Hebrew at the age of fourteen, and became professor of Greek at Giessen in 1605. Among his works are a "System of Chronology," ("Theatrum Chronologicum," 1609,) and a "General Grammar." Died in 1617.

Helwig, hĕl'wĭg, or Helwing, hĕl'wĭng, (Georg Andreas,) a Prussian naturalist, born at Angerburg in 1666, became minister of the church at that town in 1705. He wrote, besides other works, "Flora Quasimodogenita," (1712,) a description of the indigenous plants of Prussia. Died in 1748.

Helwig, (JOHANN OTTO,) a German physician and alchemist, born in Thuringia in 1654. He became first physician to the Elector-palatine, who appointed him professor at Heidelberg. He wrote a curious work, entitled "Introitus in veram et inauditam Physicam," (1678,) and several treatises on alchemy. Died in 1698.

See ERSCH und GRUBER, "Allgemeine Encyklopaedie."

Hélyot, *h*ā′le-o′, (PIERRE,) called also Père Hippolyte, a French monk, born in Paris in 1660. He wrote a "History of Military and Religious Monastic Orders," said to be the most complete work on that subject. Died in 1716.

Hem′anș, (CHARLES ISIDORE,) an English antiquary, son of Mrs. Hemans the poetess, left England in early life and settled in Italy, where he devoted himself to archæological studies. He published "The Story of Monuments in Rome and her Environs," (1864–65,) "A History of Christianity and Sacred Art in Italy," (1866,) etc. Died in 1876.

Hem′anș, (FELICIA DOROTHEA,) an amiable and excellent English poetess, born in Liverpool on the 25th of September, 1794, was the daughter of a merchant named Browne. About the year 1800 he removed with his family to Grwych, in North Wales. Her first volume of poems was published in 1808. In 1812 she was married to Captain Hemans, of the British army; but the union was not a happy one, and after the lapse of six years they finally separated, their five children remaining with the mother. In 1825 she removed to Rhyllon, in Wales, and in 1828 resided at Wavertree, near Liverpool. She cherished a passionate love of poetry and of natural scenery, and became the most popular of English poetesses. Lord Jeffrey pronounced her poetry "infinitely sweet, elegant, and tender, touching, perhaps, and contemplative, rather than vehement or overpowering. . . . We do not hesitate to say that she is the most touching and accomplished writer of occasional verses that our literature has yet to boast of." "In her poetry," says Moir, "religious truth, moral purity, and intellectual beauty ever meet together." The following are the titles of some of her poems: "Domestic Affections," (1812,) "Modern Greece," (1817,) "Vespers of Palermo," (1823,) "The Forest Sanctuary," (1826,) "Records of Woman," (1828,) "National Lyrics," (1834,) and "Scenes and Hymns of Life." Her character may be said to be truly portrayed in her writings. She resided in Dublin from 1831 until her death, which occurred in 1835.

Hemsterhuys, hẽm′stẹr-hois′, [Lat. HEMSTERHUSIUS,] (FRANS,) a meritorious philosopher, writer, and moralist, born at Groningen in 1720, was a son of Tiberius, noticed below. He passed the greater part of his mature life at the Hague, where he was assistant secretary or first clerk of the council of state. Among his characteristic traits were simplicity, modesty, and liberality of spirit. Like Plato, of whom he was an admirer, he directed towards the ideal the intellectual and moral activity of man. His favourite topics were the theory of beauty in the arts, and questions of practical philosophy. He wrote, in French, a "Letter on Sculpture," (1769,) a "Letter on the Desires," (1770,) a "Letter on Man and his Relations," (1772,) and two dialogues, entitled "Sophyle, or on Philosophy," and "Aristée, or on the Divinity," ("Aristée, ou de la Divinité," 1779.) Died in 1790.

Hemsterhuys, (TIBERIUS,) a Dutch philologist, and one of the most learned Hellenists of his time, was born at Groningen in 1685. He became professor of philosophy and mathematics at Amsterdam in 1704, and continued the study of Greek until he had read all the authors in that language. He was chosen professor of Greek at Franeker in 1720, and obtained the same chair at Leyden in 1740. In consequence of his efforts, the study of Greek, which had been neglected, again became popular in Holland. He published Lucian's "Dialogues," (1708,) the "Plutus" of Aristophanes, (1744,) "Notes on Xenophon of Ephesus," "Latin Orations," (1784,) and other works. Died in 1766.

Henao, ȧ-nā′o, (GABRIEL,) a Spanish Jesuit, born at Valladolid in 1611, was for fifty years professor of positive theology at the University of Salamanca, of which he was also rector. He gained a high reputation as a casuist, and wrote numerous theological works. Died in 1704.

Hénault, *h*ā′nō′, (CHARLES JEAN FRANÇOIS,) a French historian, born in Paris in 1685. In youth he cultivated literature and obtained a prize in the French Academy, of which he became a member in 1723. His wit, amenity, and politeness rendered him a favourite in fashionable society, for which he composed ingenious verses and songs. He became president of the first Chambre aux Enquêtes in 1710, and, a few years later, superintendent of the queen's household. He gained a conspicuous position among French authors by his "Compendium of the History of France," ("Abrégé chronologique de l'Histoire de France," 2 vols., 1744,) a work of great merit, which was often reprinted. Hénault wrote, besides other dramas, "Marius," a tragedy, (1715,) and the "Awaking of Epimenides," a comedy, (1757,) both of which were performed with success. Died in 1770.

Hen'der-son, (EBENEZER,) an eminent British biblical critic, born at Dunfermline in 1784. He was employed by the Bible Society to supply the people of Iceland with a version of the Scriptures in 1814. He published a "Journal of a Residence in Iceland," (2 vols., 1818,) and "Biblical Researches and Travels in Russia," (1826.) His commentary on Isaiah (of which he made a new version, 1840) is highly commended. He was professor of theology and minister of the Independents at Highbury, near London. Died in May, 1858.

See ERSLEW, "Almindeligt Forfatter-Lexicon."

Henderson, (EBENEZER,) LL.D., a Scottish astronomer, born in 1809. He wrote a "Life of James Ferguson," "Historical Horology," a "Treatise on Astronomy," and "Annals of Dunfermline." Died at Muckart, November 2, 1879.

Henderson, (JOHN,) a celebrated English actor, born in London in 1746. In 1772 he performed at Bath, under the name of Courtney, and in 1777 came to London, where he attracted crowded houses in Drury Lane and Covent Garden. He performed with great applause the parts of "Falstaff," "Shylock," "Richard III.," etc. Died in 1785.

Henderson, (JOHN,) born in Ireland in 1757, was distinguished for his genius and eccentricity. After teaching Latin at the age of eight, and Greek four years later, he was sent to Oxford University, where he was regarded as a prodigy in learning and mental capacity. A fellow-student, being vanquished by him in an argument, threw a glass of wine into the face of Henderson, who calmly remarked, "This is only a digression, sir: let us now examine your argument." He wrote a few small poems and essays. Died in 1788.

Henderson, (PETER,) a Scottish-American gardener and author, born at Pathead, Midlothian, June 25, 1823. He came in early life to the United States, engaged with great success in greenhouse horticulture in Jersey City, and became also a seedsman in New York. His most popular works are "Gardening for Profit," (1866,) "Practical Floriculture," (1868,) "Gardening for Pleasure," (1875,) "Hand-Book of Plants," (1881,) "Garden and Farm Topics," (1883,) and "How the Farm Pays," (1884.) Died January 17, 1890.

Henderson, (THOMAS,) a Scottish astronomer, born at Dundee in 1798, pursued for some years the profession of an attorney. About 1830 he was employed as secretary by Lord Jeffrey. Having devoted his leisure time to astronomy, he was appointed in 1832 director of the observatory at the Cape of Good Hope. He obtained in 1834 the charge of the Edinburgh Observatory, as first astronomer-royal for Scotland, and performed the duties of this post with credit until his death, in 1844. Many of his astronomical treatises and observations have been published, and are highly esteemed. About 1840 he ascertained that the star α Centauri has a parallax of nearly one second, and is, consequently, about 18,918,000,000,000 miles from the sun. This was the first fixed star of which the parallax has been measured.

Hen'dricks, (THOMAS A.,) an American Senator, born in Muskingum county, Ohio, in 1819. He studied law, and settled in Indiana. He represented a district of Indiana in Congress from 1851 to 1855, was commissioner of the general land office from 1855 to 1859, and was elected a Senator of the United States for six years, 1863–69. In 1872 he was the successful Democratic candidate for Governor of Indiana. He was a candidate for the vice-presidency of the United States in 1876, and in 1884 was chosen to that office, Mr. Cleveland at the same time being elected President. Died Nov. 25, 1885.

Henel von Hennefeld, hā'nęl fon hĕn'nęh-fĕlt', (NIKOLAUS,) a German jurist and historian, born in Silesia in 1582. He was author of several legal and historical works. Died in 1656.

Hĕn'frey, (ARTHUR,) F.R.S., an eminent English botanist, born at Aberdeen on the 1st of November, 1819. He translated several botanical works from the German, and wrote "Outlines of Structural and Physiological Botany," (1847,) "The Vegetation of Europe," (1852,) and an "Elementary Course of Botany, Structural, Physiological, and Systematic," (1857.) The last is a work of high character. He co-operated with Dr. Griffith in a "Micrographic Dictionary," (1857,) which is highly prized. In 1854 he was chosen professor of botany in King's College, London. Died in 1859.

Hengist, hĕng'gĭst, a Saxon chief, who founded the kingdom of Kent, in England. About 450 A.D. the Britons solicited the aid of the Saxons to defend them against the Picts and Scots. Hengist and his brother Horsa, at the head of a small army, came over, and, after defeating the Picts and Scots, turned their arms against their British allies. After many battles, in one of which Horsa was slain, Hengist, aided by reinforcements from Saxony, obtained possession of Kent, where he reigned thirty years. Died in 488.

Hengstenberg, hĕng'stęn-bĕRG', (ERNST WILHELM,) an eminent German orthodox theologian, born at Fröndenberg, in Prussia, in 1802. He became professor of theology in the University of Berlin in 1829, and chief editor of an influential religious journal, "Evangelische Kirchenzeitung." He published several commentaries on the Holy Scriptures, and "Christologie des Alten Testaments," ("Christology of the Old Testament," 3 vols., 1829–35,) which has been translated into English. He was one of the principal leaders of the orthodox or Lutherans of Germany. Died in June, 1869.

Henisch, hā'nish, (GEORG,) a philologist, born in Hungary in 1549, published "Thesaurus Linguæ et Sapientiæ Germanicæ," (1616,) said to be the first good dictionary of the German language, (though not extending beyond the letter H.) Died in 1618.

Henkart, hĕnk'ărt, (PIERRE JOSEPH,) a Belgian poet and judge, born at Liege in 1761; died in 1815.

Henke, hĕnk'ĕh, (ADOLF CHRISTIAN HEINRICH,) a German physician, born at Brunswick in 1775, became professor at Erlangen in 1805. He published a valuable "Treatise on Legal Medicine," (1812; 12th edition, 1851.) Died in 1843.

Henke, (HEINRICH PHILIPP KONRAD,) an able German theologian, born in the duchy of Brunswick in 1752, became professor of theology at Helmstedt in 1780, and subsequently vice-president of the Consistory at Brunswick. He published, besides other works, an "Ecclesiastical History," (6 vols., 1788–1804,) a work displaying great learning and research, and "Lineamenta Institutionum Fidei Christianæ," (1783.) Died in 1809.

See F. A. LUDEWIG, "Abriss einer Lebensgeschichte Henkes;" BOLLMANN und WOLFF, "H. P. C. Henke, Denkwürdigkeiten aus seinem Leben," 1816; ERSCH und GRUBER, "Allgemeine Encyklopaedie."

Henke, (HERMANN WILHELM EDUARD,) a jurist, brother of Adolf Christian Heinrich, noticed above, was born in 1783. Died March 14, 1869.

Henkel or Henckel, hĕnk'ęl, (JOACHIM FRIEDRICH,) a skilful Prussian surgeon, born in 1712. He practised and lectured in Berlin, and published, besides other works, "Medical and Surgical Observations," (1744.) Died in 1779.

Henkel, (JOHANN FRIEDRICH,) an able chemist and mineralogist, born at Freiberg, in Saxony, in 1679. He was appointed counsellor of mines by King Augustus II., and improved the porcelain fabrics of Meissen. He wrote "Flora Saturnizans," (1722,) "Principles of Mineralogy," (1747,) and other works. Died in 1744.

See ERSCH und GRUBER, "Allgemeine Encyklopaedie."

Henkle, hĕnk'ęl, (MOSES MONTGOMERY,) D.D., an American Methodist divine, born in Pendleton county, Virginia, in 1798. In 1860 he removed to Philadelphia. He wrote, besides other works, "Primary Platform of Methodism," (1851.) Died at Richmond in 1864.

Henle, hĕn'lęh, (FRIEDRICH GUSTAV JAKOB,) a German physician, born in Franconia in 1809, became professor of anatomy and director of the Anatomical Institute at Göttingen in 1852. He published a "Manual of Rational Pathology," (1846–52,) etc. Died in 1885.

Hen'ley, (ANTHONY,) an English scholar and writer, born in Hampshire, was educated at Oxford. In 1698 he was elected to Parliament, where he acquired much influence. He was a person of distinguished wit, refinement, and accomplishments, possessed a large fortune, and was a liberal patron of literary men. He contributed to the "Tatler" and the "Medley," and wrote lyric verses. Died in 1711.

His son ROBERT became lord chancellor

Henley, (JOHN,) often called ORATOR HENLEY, was born at Melton-Mowbray in 1692, and educated at Cambridge. Before he had left the university, he wrote a letter inserted in the 396th number of the "Spectator." In 1719 he published a "Universal Grammar." Having taken holy orders, he came to London and opened a chapel, where large crowds were attracted by his elocution and by his questionable modes of courting popularity. Pope commemorates him in the "Dunciad" as "the Zany of his age." On Sundays he lectured on theology, and on Wednesdays on politics, fashions, and affairs in general. He edited a paper called the "Hyp Doctor,"—a farrago of nonsense,—by which, it is said, he made one hundred pounds a year. Died in 1756.

Henley, LORD. See EDEN, Sir MORTON.

Henley, (JOSEPH WARNER,) a British conservative legislator, born about 1794. He was elected to the House of Commons for Oxfordshire in 1841. He was appointed president of the board of trade by Lord Derby in 1852, and again in 1858. On account of his hostility to the Reform Bill, he resigned in 1859. Died in 1884.

Henley, (ROBERT,) Lord Northington, son of Anthony Henley, was born in 1708, and educated at Oxford. He was called to the bar in 1732, and began to practise in the Western Circuit, of which he afterwards became the leader. In 1747 he was returned to Parliament for Bath, and became an active debater. In 1756 he obtained the place of attorney-general. According to Lord Campbell, "Henley had not the most distant notion of the great seal being offered to him; but his mediocrity was the real cause of his elevation;" and in 1757 he was named lord keeper by Pitt, then one of the chiefs of the ministry. After the accession of George III., he received in 1761 the title of lord chancellor, and was created Earl of Northington. In 1766, after overturning the Rockingham ministry, with which as a Tory he could not agree, he resigned his office, and accepted that of president of the council. He acquitted himself respectably as a judge. Died in 1772.

Hen'ne-pin, [Fr. pron. ĥĕn'pĂN' or ĥĕn'neh-pĂN',] (LOUIS,) a missionary, was born in Flanders about 1640. Having a passion for exploring remote regions, he embarked for Canada, arriving at Quebec in 1675, and joined the party of La Salle in 1678. When they had reached the Illinois River, La Salle being forced to return, Hennepin proceeded without him, in 1680, and explored the Upper Mississippi as far as the falls, to which he gave the name of Saint Anthony, and which had not before been visited by any European. He returned to Quebec in 1680, and sailed to France, where he published in 1683–84 an account of his travels, under the title of a "Description of Louisiana." Thirteen years later, he published his "New Discovery of a Vast Country situated in America," etc., which contained the same matter as the former, with the addition of an account of his voyage down the Lower Mississippi, which, according to Professor Sparks, is a fabrication, copied from Le Clercq's narrative. (Sparks's "Life of La Salle.") Hennepin receives credit for courage and resolution, and for general accuracy in his descriptions of Indian life, etc.

Hennequin, ĥĕn'kĂN', (AMÉDÉE,) an advocate and writer, a son of the following, born in Paris in 1817, wrote "The Conquest of Algeria," (1857,) and other works. He died August 25, 1859.

Hennequin, (ANTOINE LOUIS MARIE,) a distinguished French lawyer, born at Monceaux, near Paris, in 1786. He had a high rank as an eloquent pleader, and acted as counsel in many political trials. He defended Peyronnet, ex-minister, in 1830, and was elected to the Chamber of Deputies in 1834. In politics he was a legitimist. His principal work is a "Treatise on Legislation and Jurisprudence," (2 vols., 1838.) Died in 1840.

Hennequin, (PIERRE AUGUSTE,) a French historical painter, born at Lyons in 1763, was a pupil of David. He studied in Rome, and was a zealous partisan of the Revolution, after which he worked in Paris. Among his capital works is "Orestes pursued by the Furies." Died in 1833.

Hen'nęs-sy, (Sir JOHN POPE,) an Irish statesman, born in Cork in 1834. Educated at Queen's College, Cork, he was returned to Parliament in 1859, and admitted to the bar in 1861. He was a conservative Catholic in politics. After 1867 he for many years was governor of various British colonies. His principal work is "Raleigh in Ireland," (1883.) Died in 1891.

Hennessy, (WILLIAM MAUNSELL,) an Irish scholar, born at Castlegregory, county of Kerry, in 1828. He became a journalist of Dublin, and was appointed to a prominent place in the public record office. He is best known for his valuable papers on the Celtic language, literature, and archæology. Died Jan. 13, 1889.

Hennet, ĥĕ'nĕ', (ALBIN JOSEPH ULPIEN,) a French writer, born at Maubeuge in 1758. Among his works is a "History of the French Academy," (6 vols., in manuscript.) Died in 1828.

Henni, hen'nee, (JOHN MARTIN,) D.D., an archbishop, born at Obersaxen, (Grisons,) Switzerland, June 15, 1805. He was educated at Saint Gall, Lucerne, and Rome, came to the United States in 1829, and became a Roman Catholic priest at Cincinnati. In 1844 he was consecrated Bishop of Milwaukee, and was in 1875 appointed archbishop of the same see. Died at Milwaukee, September 7, 1880.

Henniges, von, fon hĕn'nę-gĕs', (HEINRICH,) a Prussian publicist, born at Weissenburg in 1645. He represented Prussia at the Diet of Ratisbon in 1709, and at that of Frankfort in 1711. Among his works are "Observations on Grotius," (1673,) and "Reflections on the Treaty of Münster," (1706.) Died in 1711.

Hen'nĭ-kęr, (Sir FREDERICK,) an English traveller, born in London in 1793. He published in 1824 an amusing narrative, entitled "Notes during a Visit to Egypt, Nubia," etc. Died in 1825.

Hen'ning, (JOHN,) a Scottish sculptor, born at Paisley in 1771, worked some years in Edinburgh, whence he removed to London in 1811. He executed reduced copies of the Panathenaic frieze. Died in 1851.

Henninges, hĕn'ning-ĕs, or Henniges, (HIERONYMUS,) a German genealogist, of great learning, born at Lüneburg about 1550, published "Theatrum Genealogicum," etc., (5 vols., 1598.) Died in 1597.

Hennings, hĕn'nings, (AUGUST ADOLF FRIEDRICH,) born in Holstein in 1746, wrote "Philosophic Essays," (2 vols., 1780,) and other works. Died in 1826.

Hennuyer, le, leh hĕn'nü-e'yà', (JEAN,) born at Saint-Quentin, in France, in 1497, became Bishop of Lisieux in 1560. He held the office of first almoner to Henry II., Francis II., Charles IX., and Henry III. Died in 1578.

Henri, (Kings of France.) See HENRY.

Henri de Bourgogne, ĥôN're deh booR'goñ', surnamed THE GREAT, was the first proprietary Duke of Burgundy. In 987 his brother, Hugh Capet, having become King of France, gave him the duchy of that province as his proper heritage. Died in 1002.

Henri de Bourgogne, ancestor of the first branch of the kings of Portugal, was born about 1035. He was nephew of Henry I., King of France. About 1060 he went to Spain, and fought against the Moors under Alphonso VI. of Castile, who made him count souverain of the country between the Douro and the Minho. In 1103 he took part in the crusade in Palestine. He died about 1112. His son ALFONSO was the first King of Portugal.

Henri de Lausanne, ȟôN'rē' dẹh lō'zăn', an eloquent monk and zealous reformer. He preached in various parts of France, attacked boldly the vices of the clergy, and made many converts. He was opposed by Saint Bernard, and was cast into a prison, where he died in 1148.

Hen-rĭ-et'tạ Anne, a daughter of Charles I. of England and of Henrietta Maria, was born at Exeter in 1644, and was married in 1661 to the Duke of Orléans, brother of Louis XIV., of whose court she was regarded as one of the brightest ornaments. At her funeral, in 1670, Bossuet pronounced one of his most eloquent discourses.

See W. H. D. ADAMS, "Famous Beauties and Historic Women," London, 1865.

Hen-rĭ-et'tạ Ma-rī'ạ, [Fr. HENRIETTE MARIE,] Queen of England, born in 1609, was a daughter of Henry IV. of France and Mary de Medici. She was married in 1625 to Prince Charles, afterwards Charles I. of England, and it was stipulated that she should enjoy liberty to use the Catholic forms of worship. "By her sense and spirit, as well as beauty, she justified the fondness of her husband." In 1645 she was compelled to retire to France. She died near Paris in 1669. There is no doubt that she was the direct cause of many of her husband's errors of policy.

Henrion, ȟôN'rē'ôN', (DENIS,) a French mathematician, who translated Euclid into French, (1632,) was the first Frenchman who published a table of logarithms. Died about 1640.

Henrion, (MATHIEU RICHARD AUGUSTE,) a French Catholic writer, born at Metz in 1805, published a "History of the Papacy," (3 vols., 1832,) and other works. Died in 1862.

Henrion, (NICOLAS,) a French numismatist, born at Troyes in 1663; died in 1720.

Henrion de Pansey, ȟôN'rē'ôN' dẹh pôN'sā', (PIERRE PAUL NICOLAS,) a learned French judge and jurist, born near Ligny, in Lorraine, in 1742. He gained distinction by pleading the cause of a negro claimed as a slave, who obtained his liberty. About 1770 he opened an office for consultation, and in 1779 published an excellent "Dissertation on Feudal Law." In 1810 Napoleon appointed him a member of the council of state, saying, "You should have been in the council these last ten years: I have scolded Cambacérès for not speaking of you sooner." He became first president of the court of cassation in 1828. He wrote several able works on civil and public law. Died in 1829.

Henriot or Hanriot, ȟôN'rē'o', (FRANÇOIS,) born at Nanterre in 1761, was one of the miscreants who gained a bad eminence in the reign of terror by their atrocities. He was chosen by the Commune leader of the armed populace which in May, 1793, surrounded the Convention and extorted from that body by violence and terror the proscription of the Girondists. At the time of Robespierre's downfall, in 1794, Henriot made desperate efforts to rescue him, but failed, and was executed with him.

Henriquel-Dupont, ȟôN'rē'kel' dü'pôN', (LOUIS PIERRE,) an eminent French engraver, born in Paris in 1797, engraved portraits (after French artists) of Andrew Chénier, Mirabeau, and Montaigne; also, "The Virgin and Child," after Raphael. Died January 20, 1892.

Henriquez, ĕn-ree'kĕth, (CRISOSTOMO,) a Spanish author, born at Madrid in 1594, wrote biographies of saints, etc., and some historical works. Died in 1632.

Henry (Heinrich) I., surnamed THE FOWLER, [Lat. HENRI'CUS AU'CEPS; Fr. HENRI L'OISELEUR, ȟôN'rē' lwâz'lŭR',] Emperor of Germany, born in 876 A.D., was the son of Otho, Duke of Saxony, and the first German emperor of the Saxon house. Though he had previously been engaged in a war with the emperor Conrad I., he was recommended by that sovereign on his death-bed for his successor, and he was elected in 919. After waging war for some time against the Hungarians without success, he gained a decisive victory over them near Merseburg in 933. Henry was the first German emperor who granted municipal privileges. He died in 936, and was succeeded by his son, Otho I.

Henry (Heinrich) II., called THE SAINT, was the son of Henry, Duke of Bavaria, and great-grandson of Henry the Fowler. He was born in 972. Having accompanied the emperor Otho III. to Rome, where he died, Henry took possession of the crown jewels, and in 1002 caused himself to be crowned emperor at Mentz. He was engaged in numerous broils with his brother Bruno, Henry, (the Marquis of Schweinfurt,) and Harduin of Ivrea. He died in 1024, and was succeeded by Conrad II.

See A. CRAMMER, "Admiranda Vita S. Henrici," 1770; J. RION, "Das heilige Kaiserpaar, oder Leben und Thaten des heiligen Heinrichs," etc., 1832.

Henry (Heinrich) III., born in 1017, was the son of Conrad II., and was chosen emperor in 1039. He curbed the power of his principal nobles, carried on successful wars in Bohemia, Hungary, and Northern Italy, and in 1046 deposed successively the popes Benedict IX., Sylvester III., and Gregory IV., and raised Clement II. to the pontificate. He died in 1056, having previously caused his son Henry to be elected emperor. Henry III. was endowed with commanding talents and great energy of character, and ranks among the ablest of German rulers.

See NEU, "Themata quædam selectiora de Henrico III.," 1718.

Henry (Heinrich) IV., son of Henry III., born in 1050, was five years of age at his father's death. In 1065, in an assembly at Worms, he was declared of age, through the influence of his preceptor, Adalbert, Archbishop of Bremen, who assumed the chief power. About 1073 Henry became engaged in a contest with Magnus, Duke of Saxony, in the course of which he appealed to Pope Gregory VII. The latter, having in vain remonstrated with the emperor for selling sees and benefices in his dominions, now summoned him to Rome to answer the charges preferred against him. Upon this, Henry, in a Diet at Worms in 1076, deposed the pope, and was soon after excommunicated by him. The emperor, finding his subjects inclined to revolt, and fearing the loss of his crown, set out for Italy with his wife and child in the midst of winter, and, meeting the pope at the castle of Canossa, was required to stand barefoot for three days in an open court-yard before the ban was removed. A civil war now ensued, attended by new excommunications on the part of the pope and another deposition on that of the emperor, till at length the latter, whose son Henry had rebelled against him, took refuge at Liege, where he died in 1106. (See GREGORY VII.)

Henry V., born in 1081, was the son of Henry IV., and the last emperor of the Salic line. During his father's lifetime he had, at the instigation of Pope Paschal II., been acknowledged as emperor in 1106. Though at first inclined to favour the pope, he soon showed his determination to maintain his right of investiture, and Paschal at length consented to crown him in 1111, at which time he married Matilda, daughter of Henry I. of England. After a contest with the papal party, he succeeded in deposing the pope, and set up Gregory VIII. in his stead. This measure was opposed by the cardinals, who chose Gelasius II., on whose death Calixtus II. succeeded to the tiara. With the latter Henry concluded a treaty in 1122, by which he gave up the right of investiture. He died in 1125, and was succeeded by Lothaire of Saxony.

See J. MASCOV, "Commentarii de Rebus Imperii Romano-Germanici," 1748; E. GERVAIS, "Geschichte Deutschlands unter der Regierung Kaiser Heinrichs V.," 1842.

Henry VI., born in 1165, was the son of Frederick Barbarossa, whom he succeeded as Emperor of Germany in 1190. With the view of subduing Sicily, which he claimed by right of his wife Constance, he invaded that country, but, being unsuccessful, was obliged to return to Germany. Here, with the ransom-money which he received for his prisoner Richard Cœur de Lion, he fitted out another expedition. After taking Naples and bringing Sicily into subjection, he caused himself to be crowned at Palermo. His conduct towards the Sicilians was marked by great tyranny and cruelty, and his death, which took place in 1197, is supposed to have been caused by poison. Henry VI. was the third emperor of the Hohenstaufen line. He was succeeded by Philip of Suabia and Otho IV., between whom the crown was contested for several years. (See OTHO IV.)

See W. JÄGER, "Geschichte Kaiser Heinrichs VI.," 1790.

Henry VII., born in 1262, was the son of Henry, Count of Luxemburg, and was chosen emperor in 1308. Soon after his accession he marched into Italy and sought to restore peace in that country, then distracted by the war of the Guelphs and Ghibelines. He was on the point of attacking Naples, when he died suddenly in 1313,—as is generally believed, by poison.

See F. H. BARTHOLD, "Der Römerzug König Heinrichs von Lutzelburg," 1830; JAKOB PAUL VON GUNDLING, "Geschichte Kayser Heinrichs VII.," 1719.

Henry I., King of England, surnamed BEAUCLERC, born at Selby, Yorkshire, in 1068, was the fourth son of William the Conqueror by Matilda of Flanders. As his surname indicates, he received a better scholastic education than was then usual even among princes. His father at his death left him a legacy of five thousand pounds. Henry was hunting with his brother William Rufus in the New Forest in August, 1100, when the latter was killed. The eldest brother, Robert, being absent in foreign travel, Henry usurped the throne. The people were the more disposed to acquiesce as he presently issued a charter in which their rights and liberties were reaffirmed. He married Maud, or Matilda, a Scottish princess, the niece of Edgar Atheling. In 1101 Robert entered England with an army; but the contest was settled without a battle, and Henry remained in quiet possession of the throne. A few years after, Henry required Robert to cede to him the duchy of Normandy for a sum of money, and, on his refusal, invaded Normandy in 1106, defeated Robert at Tenchebrai, and deprived him of his dominions and liberty. In 1113 Louis VI. of France attempted with an army to assert the right of Robert's son, but without success. Henry's only son William perished at sea in 1120, after which the father was never seen to smile. His daughter Matilda was declared his heir in 1126, and next year was married to Geoffrey Plantagenet, Earl of Anjou. The issue of this marriage became Henry II. Though the character of Henry was far from amiable, he possessed a large share of kingly qualities, including judgment, eloquence, and bravery. He died in 1135, and was succeeded by his nephew, Stephen of Blois.

See HUME, "History of England," chap. vi.; JOHN HAYWARD, "Lives of Three Norman Kings of England," 1613.

Henry II., King of England, founder of the Plantagenet dynasty, was born at Le Mans, France, in 1133. His father was Geoffrey Plantagenet, (so named from the broom-plant—in Latin, planta genista—which he wore in his cap,) and his mother was Matilda, daughter of Henry I. In the contest which followed the death of Henry I., Stephen obtained England, and the infant Henry was recognized as heir of Normandy, to which at the death of his father, in 1151, Anjou, Touraine, and Maine were added. The next year he married Eleanor, Duchess of Guienne, (whom Louis, King of France, had divorced,) whose dowry was Poitou and Guienne; and he thus became master of nearly half of France. In 1153 he invaded England; but, before much blood was spilled, a treaty was made, by which Stephen retained the crown during his lifetime, and Henry was recognized as his successor. Stephen died in 1154.

Henry began his reign by discharging the foreign troops, razing to the ground the castles of the rebellious barons, and by other energetic and politic measures. He was several times involved in war with the King of France, without important results. His reign was greatly disturbed by the usurpations of the pope and clergy, and by a contest with the haughty Thomas a Becket, whom he had made prime minister and Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1164 a council of nobles and prelates adopted the famous Constitutions of Clarendon, which recognized the supremacy of the crown over the church. Becket was murdered in 1170 by an over-officious servant of the king, who in 1174 performed severe penance at his tomb, and soon after the Constitutions above named were repealed. The conquest of Ireland was effected by Henry's arms between 1169 and 1175. His last years were rendered unhappy by the rebellion of his sons, who were instigated by Queen Eleanor and supported by Louis of France. "Henry was," says Hume, "the greatest prince of his time for wisdom, virtue, and abilities. His character in private as well as public life is almost without a blemish." But Michelet charges him with sensuality and other vices. He died at Chinon, in France, in 1189, and was succeeded by his son, Richard I.

See HUME, "History of England," chaps. viii. and ix.; MICHELET, "History of France;" E. BOLTON, "Life of Henry II.;" LORD LYTTELTON, "History of Henry II.," 1764-67; BERINGTON, "Life of Henry II.," 1790; FREEMAN, "History of the Angevin Kings of England."

Henry III., King of England, surnamed OF WINCHESTER, from the place of his birth, was born in 1206, and was the eldest son of King John by his queen, Isabella of Angoulême. He was acknowledged king in 1216, and the Earl of Pembroke was appointed regent during the minority. In 1222 Henry was declared of age to exercise some of the functions of royalty. In 1230 he invaded France, with which he had been at war for several years, but returned without any important achievement. He married Eleanor, daughter of Raymond, Count of Provence, in 1236, and a few years afterwards renewed hostilities against Louis IX. of France, by whom he was defeated. His feeble character, misgovernment, and ill success rendered him an object of contempt among his people and provoked many contests with his Parliaments. He confirmed the Magna Charta, but repeatedly violated it. In 1258 the barons, headed by the ambitious and popular Simon de Montfort, Earl of Leicester, revolted against the king, who was forced to yield his power to a committee of twenty-four. For several years a civil war was waged between the king and the barons, with various success, until the latter, in 1264, obtained a decisive victory at Lewes, where the king and his son Edward were taken prisoners. The Earl of Leicester then became dictator of the country. In 1265 Prince Edward escaped, raised an army, and defeated the barons at Evesham, where De Montfort was slain, and the royal authority was restored. After a reign of fifty-six years,—the longest in the English annals before that of George III.,—Henry died in 1272, and was succeeded by his son, Edward I. This reign presents the first example of a Parliament constituted as at present, with representatives from the counties, cities, and boroughs. The king was eminent as a builder.

See HUME, "History of England," chap. xii.; R. COTTON, "Life of Henry III.," 1627; W. PRYNNE, "Life of Henry III.," 1670.

Henry IV., King of England, surnamed BOLINGBROKE, was the eldest son of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, who was the fourth son of King Edward the Third. His mother was Blanche, daughter of Henry Plantagenet, a descendant of Henry II. He was born at Bolingbroke in 1366. In 1397 he married Mary de Bohun, daughter of the last Earl of Hereford, and was created Duke of Hereford. The next year he was banished for ten years by Richard II. By the death of his father, in 1399, he became Duke of Lancaster; but the king refused to give him possession of his estate. With the avowed purpose of vindicating his right, Henry returned to England, where he was joined by other nobles, and soon assembled an army of 60,000 men. The king, unable to resist, and deserted by his disaffected subjects, was deposed by Parliament in 1399, and Henry succeeded him, with the general consent of the nation, although the Earl of March was the more legitimate heir. In 1402 a Scottish army, which invaded England with the pretext of restoring Richard, was defeated at Homildon Hill. Soon afterwards his throne was menaced by the rebellion of the famous Henry Percy, surnamed Hotspur, in concert with the Welsh chieftain Owen Glendower and others. At the battle of Shrewsbury, where the king fought with desperate courage, the rebels were completely defeated, and Percy, their leader, was slain. Glendower maintained for several years an irregular warfare in the mountains of Wales; and the Percy family again revolted in 1408, but were finally defeated at Branham, where the Earl of Northumberland was killed. The popularity which Henry enjoyed at his accession was not retained in the latter part of his reign. Hume says, "His prudence, vigilance, and foresight in maintaining his power were admirable; and he possessed many qualities which fitted him for his high station, and which rendered his usurpation of it, though pernicious in after-times, rather salutary during his own reign to the English nation." He died in 1413, and was succeeded by his son, Henry V. Henry IV. gives the name to one of Shakspeare's most popular dramas, in two parts.

See HUME, "History of England," chap. xviii.; SIR J. HAYWARD, "Life and Reign of Henry IV.," 1599; G. P. R. JAMES, "Life of Henry IV."

Henry V., King of England, born at Monmouth in 1388, was the eldest son of Henry IV. and of Mary de Bohun. In his father's reign he displayed courage at the battle of Shrewsbury, and gave proof of great military talents in the war with the Welsh. In 1413 Henry was proclaimed king, with abundant expression of the popular favour, and began his reign with several acts of generosity. He released the Earl of March (the lawful heir of the crown) from prison, and restored the heir of Percy to his title and estate. Having resolved to assert his claim to the throne of France, which was then a prey to civil dissensions, he embarked in 1415 with an army of 30,000 men. After taking Harfleur, and losing a large part of his army by disease, he was marching homeward, when his progress was opposed by D'Albret, Constable of France, with an army about four times more numerous than his own. On the 25th of October, 1415, was fought the memorable battle of Agincourt, in which the French were defeated, with a loss of about 24,000 men, including prisoners. The victor returned to England without delay.

In 1417, profiting by the imbecility of the French king and the feuds among the nobles, he renewed hostilities, captured Rouen, and threatened Paris. In 1420 a treaty of peace was made at Troyes, with the conditions that Henry should marry Catherine, the daughter of King Charles VI., and should inherit the crown at the death of the latter. One of the French factions, however, headed by the dauphin, did not consent to this disgraceful transaction, and made a brave stand for the national cause. Henry's brother, the Duke of Clarence, was defeated and slain at Baugé; but at other places the English were successful, and Henry seemed on the point of realizing his ambitious projects, when he died prematurely in 1422, (a few weeks before Charles VI.,) leaving an infant son, who afterwards reigned as Henry VI. After his death, his widow Catherine married Owen Tudor, a Welshman, whose posterity became the royal family of England. The frankness and energy of his character and the glory of his victories rendered Henry the idol of the English people; but his glory is obscured or stained by the injustice of the enterprise in which his life was chiefly spent. Henry V. gives the name to one of Shakspeare's historical dramas, and constitutes a prominent and interesting character in both parts of the two-fold drama entitled "Henry IV."

See HUME, "History of England," chap. xix.; ELHAM, "Vita et Gesta Henrici V;" GOODWIN, "Life of Henry V.," 1604; P. F. TYTLER, "Memoirs of the Life and Character of Henry V.," 1830 "Henry of Monmouth; or, Memoirs of the Life, etc. of Henry V of England," by J. ENDELL TYLER.

Henry VI., King of England, surnamed OF WINDSOR, from the place of his birth, was the only son of Henry V. and Catherine of France. He was born in 1421, and was only nine months old when he became king. His uncle, the Duke of Gloucester, was appointed Regent or Protector of England. At the death of Charles VI. of France, in 1422, Henry was proclaimed king at Paris; but a large party of the French openly sided with the dauphin, who was styled Charles VII. Henry's uncle, the Duke of Bedford, acted as regent and representative of the English power in France. In 1424 the English gained a victory at Verneuil, after which their power gradually declined. The city of Orléans in 1429 was delivered from siege by the enthusiasm with which the heroic Joan of Arc inspired her countrymen. In 1436 the English garrison of Paris was forced to surrender. In 1445 Henry married a French lady, Margaret of Anjou, daughter of René, titular King of Sicily. She was superior in ability and energy to her husband, over whom she easily acquired a permanent ascendant.

Victory continued to attend the French arms, and before the close of 1451 not a single province of France remained in the power of the English. And now England in her turn was destined to experience the evils of an imbecile ruler, a disputed title, and an intestine war between the houses of York and Lancaster. The Duke of York, who claimed the crown as a descendant of Edward the Third's second son, was supported by many powerful nobles, among whom was the Earl of Warwick, "the King-maker." The battle of Saint Alban's, (1455,) in which the partisans of York were victorious and Henry was taken prisoner, was the beginning of a war which lasted, with interruptions, for thirty years, and in which the English nobility were nearly annihilated. As a consequence of the victory of Saint Alban's, the Duke of York became Protector. After vain attempts to reconcile the contestants, in 1460 another battle was fought, at Northampton, where the royalists were defeated, and Henry was again made prisoner by the Earl of March, the son of the Duke of York. His queen, Margaret, escaped to Scotland, and continued the war several years with vigour and partial success. At the battle of Wakefield the Duke of York was defeated and killed; but his son was proclaimed king in 1461, with the title of Edward IV. Henry, after being several times liberated and recaptured, died in prison, or, as some suppose, was murdered, in 1471. He was remarkably gentle and inoffensive, and seemed to feel little interest in the quarrel maintained on his account. Henry VI. furnishes the name to one of Shakspeare's historical dramas, in three parts, in which are represented the principal events of his reign.

See HUME, "History of England," chaps. xx. and xxi.

Henry VII., King of England, the founder of the royal line of Tudor, was born at Pembroke Castle in 1456. By his father, Edmond Tudor, Earl of Richmond, he was descended from the royal family of France; by his mother, Margaret Beaufort, he derived a claim to the English crown, as one of her ancestors was John of Gaunt, the head of the house of Lancaster. His father dying in 1456, Henry became Earl of Richmond. He was confined as a prisoner by Edward IV. for several years, and when the Lancastrians were finally defeated, in 1471, he escaped with his uncle, the Earl of Pembroke, to Brittany, where he remained until the accession of Richard III., in 1483. As Henry was now recognized as the head of the Lancastrian party, many people looked to him as the most eligible person to deliver them from Richard, who was generally detested. The leaders of both the rival houses, therefore, invited Henry to assume the royal power. The first attempt to dethrone Richard, made in 1483, was a failure. Renewing his enterprise in 1485, he landed in Wales with about 2000 men, and, after receiving large accessions, encountered Richard at Bosworth, where the latter was defeated and slain, August 22, 1485.

In accordance with a plan previously formed to reconcile the rival parties of York and Lancaster, Henry, in 1486, married Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV.,—an event which gave great satisfaction to the people. For several years his reign was disturbed by the seditious attempts of the impostors Lambert Simnel and Perkin Warbeck, the latter of whom pretended to be Richard, the younger brother of Edward V., and was supported by the court of France and by many English nobles. He was executed in 1499, after which the kingdom enjoyed internal tranquillity. Henry lost somewhat of the popular favour by his partiality for the Lancastrians and his severity towards the other party, as well as by his rapacity in raising money. Empson and Dudley became notorious as the agents of his exactions. In 1501 the king's eldest son, Arthur, was married to Catherine, a Spanish princess; and, though he died about six months after, the remote consequences of the match were very momentous. (See HENRY VIII.) In 1503 a treaty of peace with James IV. of Scotland was confirmed by the marriage of James with Margaret, daughter of Henry VII., which was one of the first steps towards a permanent union of the two kingdoms. The ministers and councillors who possessed the greatest favour and influence in this reign were Morton, Archbishop of Canterbury, and Fox, Bishop of Winchester. Henry possessed prudence, vigour, and an excellent capacity, but seems to have been deficient in the better qualities of the heart. Avarice was his ruling passion. His reign, though rather arbitrary, was accounted fortunate for the nation, and forms an important era in history, in which the discovery of America and the invention of printing gave a wonderful impetus to the human mind. He died in 1509, and was succeeded by his son, Henry VIII.

See HUME, "History of England," chaps. xxiv., xxv., and xxvi.; FRANCIS BACON, "Historia Regni Henrici VII.," 1642; ALEYN, "History of Henry VII.," in verse, 1638; MARSOLLIER, "Histoire de Henri VII." 1697.

Henry VIII., King of England, the second son of Henry VII. and of Elizabeth of York, was born at Greenwich in 1491. By the death of his brother Arthur, in 1502, he became heir-apparent of the crown, and assumed the title of Prince of Wales. The next year he was, against his will, obliged by his father to affiance himself to his brother's widow, Catherine of Aragon. His accession at the death of his father, in 1509, was the occasion of great rejoicing among the people, who were prepossessed in his favour by his personal advantages and other popular qualities. He appears to have been in early life one of the most exemplary and most accomplished princes in Europe. (See Froude's "History of England," vol. i. chap. ii.) His marriage with Catherine, who was his senior by six years, was solemnized a few months after his accession. In 1512 he was induced to oin the pope, the King of Spain, and the emperor in a league against the King of France, and sent 10,000 men to invade Guienne; but the expedition was a total failure. The next year he invaded France in person, and defeated the French at Guinegaste. In 1514 a treaty of peace was made, the chief condition of which was that Louis XII. should marry Henry's sister Mary. In 1513, James IV. of Scotland, the ally of France, having marched across the border, was defeated and slain, at the great battle of Flodden, by the English under the Earl of Surrey.

In the beginning of this reign the chief competitors for favour and influence at court were Thomas Howard, Earl of Surrey, who was treasurer, and Fox, Bishop of Winchester, who held the office of secretary. The latter introduced to the king Thomas Wolsey, who soon supplanted them both by his insinuating arts and became the prime favourite and sole minister. For about fifteen years he directed the affairs of state with almost absolute authority. In 1515 he was made Archbishop of York, and soon after a cardinal. In the long contest for supremacy between Charles V. and Francis I., Henry, whose friendship was courted by both, might have derived great advantage from his position; but, guided rather by impulse than policy, his actual influence was inconsiderable. Charles having secured Wolsey's influence by promising to concur in his election to the papacy, Henry in 1522 declared war against France, which was invaded by an English army the next year. But the cardinal had become estranged from Charles after the election of Pope Adrian, and in 1525 he concluded a treaty of peace with Francis. In 1526 Henry was declared protector of the "Holy League" formed by the pope against Charles V.; but after this period the foreign transactions of his reign are unimportant and overshadowed by the domestic events.

The impression made on the king by the beauty of Anne Boleyn, and the scruples which he felt or feigned respecting the lawfulness of his former marriage, induced him in 1527 to apply to the pope for a divorce. This question of divorce was rendered more exciting and momentous by its bearing on the Reformation, which about that time began to agitate the Church,—Anne Boleyn favouring the Protestants, and Catherine being a zealous Catholic. The pope gave him specious promises, but interposed the delay of a legal process for several years. In 1529 Wolsey was disgraced, and Cranmer, a Protestant, became Archbishop of Canterbury. Henry, whose passions and interest inclined him to favour the Reformers, as his quarrel with the pope increased both his power and revenue, was declared in 1531 supreme head of the Church. After the Convocations of York and Canterbury had pronounced the marriage with Catherine invalid, Henry, without the pope's permission, married Anne Boleyn, in 1533. Queen Catherine died in 1536. By acts of Parliament, the English church and people were declared independent of the court of Rome, and many innovations were made in religion. The monasteries, six hundred and forty-five in number, were gradually abolished, under the direction of Thomas Cromwell, secretary of state and vicar-general, and a new translation of the Bible was made by royal authority.

In 1536, Queen Anne, having lost the favour of the king, became the victim of his jealousy, which has generally been supposed to have had no other ground on her part than slight indiscretions and levity of manner. But Froude takes a different view, which he supports by many forcible arguments. (See "History of England," chap. xi.) But, whatever opinion we may form of the guilt or innocence of the queen, it is impossible to justify the conduct of Henry, who married his new favourite, the beautiful Jane Seymour, the next day after the execution of Anne. Queen Jane died in 1537, on giving birth to a son, afterwards Edward VI. In 1540 Henry married a Flemish princess, Anne of Cleves, who was divorced about six months afterwards. The same year he married, as his fifth wife, Catherine Howard. In 1538 the pope published a bull against Henry, and formally delivered his soul to the devil. The king, however, maintained several of the Catholic dogmas, (among which was that of the real presence,) and many Protestants, refusing to conform, fell victims to his arbitrary power. In 1542 Queen Catherine was beheaded, on a charge of infidelity to her marriage-vow, and the next year her place was supplied by Catherine Parr. Notwithstanding his cruelty and excesses, Henry seems to have retained the affection of his subjects in general to the close of his life. "He possessed," says Hume, "great vigour of mind, courage, vigilance, and inflexibility." But the catalogue of his vices, it must be confessed, includes some of the worst qualities of human nature. He, however, who would form a just estimate of Henry's character, should read the first four volumes of Froude's "History of England," which contain by far the most complete account of his reign that has yet been written. He died in 1547, and was succeeded by his son, Edward VI. Henry VIII. furnishes the title to one of Shakspeare's historic dramas.

Henry I., King of Castile, born in 1204, was the son of Alfonso III. of Castile. After a reign of three years, he died in 1217.

Henry II., King of Castile, often called HENRY OF TRANSTAMARE, born at Seville in 1333, was the natural son of Alfonso XI. He received the title of Count of Transtamare from his brother, King Pedro the Cruel. After striving to supplant Pedro by intrigue, he joined the King of Aragon in a war against Castile, was defeated, and fled to France. There he raised an army, and again invaded Castile in 1366, but was beaten by Pedro's ally, the English Black Prince. In a third attempt, with a French army led by Du Guesclin, he was more successful. Pedro was defeated and killed in 1368, after which Henry reigned in such a manner as to secure the favour of his subjects. He died in 1379, and left the throne to his son, John I.

Henry III., King of Castile, born in 1379, succeeded his father John in 1390, and married Catherine of Lancaster. The early part of his reign was disturbed by the rebellion of the Duke of Benavente and the Count of Gijon, whom he defeated. Having exercised his authority in certain points of church government, Pope Boniface declared him a schismatic, and absolved his subjects from allegiance to him. After this Henry recognized the rival pope, Benedict XIII., in 1403. He resisted successfully the aggressions of the Portuguese, and was engaged in a war against the Moors of Granada when he died in 1406, leaving the reputation of a wise and good king. He was succeeded by his son, John II.

Henry IV., King of Castile, the son of John II., was born at Valladolid in 1423, and was surnamed THE IMPOTENT. Having wasted his youth in vice and dissipation, he succeeded his father in 1454. He married Joanna of Portugal, whose character was so depraved or doubtful that the Cortes would not acknowledge her child Joanna to be the legitimate heir. In 1465 several grandees, encouraged by the prevalent disaffection of the people, revolted, and proclaimed Henry's brother, Alfonso, king. Henry raised an army, and a civil war followed until 1468, when Alfonso died. A peace was then made, Henry consenting to disinherit Joanna and adopt as heiress his sister, the well-known Isabella of Castile, who was married to Ferdinand of Aragon in 1469. For many years Henry waged war against the Moors of Granada without any important advantage. He died in 1474. His reign was remarkable for anarchy, oppression, and misery.

Henry [Fr. HENRI, hɔ̃n're'] I., King of France, a son of Robert, and grandson of Hugh Capet, born about 1005, ascended the throne in 1031. He was soon involved in a civil war with his younger brother Robert, who was favoured by their mother, Constance. Aided by the Duke of Normandy, Henry maintained his throne, and ceded to Robert the duchy of Burgundy. At thirty-nine he married Anna, daughter of Yaroslaf, Duke of Russia. He was almost continually at war with his vassals or neighbours, among others with William, Duke of Normandy, who conquered England. He died in 1060, and was succeeded by his son, Philip I.

See SISMONDI, "Histoire des Français."

Henry II., King of France, second son of Francis I. and of Queen Claude, was born at Saint-Germain-en-Laye in 1518, and came to the throne in 1547. He married Catherine de' Medici, (or de Médicis.) In 1550 he concluded a peace with England, by which Boulogne was restored to the French. In 1552 he formed an alliance with the Protestant princes of Germany against Charles V., and took Metz, Toul, and Verdun. The Germans having made a separate peace, Henry alone sustained the war against the Spaniards. A truce of five years was signed in 1556 between Henry and Charles; but the war was renewed the next year by Philip II. of Spain, whose army gained a great victory at Saint-Quentin. In 1558 Calais was taken by the French, after having been held by the English more than two hundred years. A treaty of peace was signed at Câteau-Cambresis in 1559, by which France retained Calais, Metz, and Verdun, and gave up Savoy. Among the results of this treaty was a marriage between Henry's daughter Elizabeth and Philip II. of Spain. At a tournament given on this occasion, Henry by accident received a mortal wound, in 1559, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Francis II.

Henry III., [often called in French HENRI DE VALOIS, hɔ̃n're' dɐ vɐl'wɐ', in Latin HENRI'CUS VALE'SIUS, i.e. "Henry of Valois,"] King of France, third son of Henry II. and of Catherine de Médicis, was born at Fontainebleau in 1551, and succeeded his brother, Charles IX., in 1574. Previously to this he was styled Duc d'Anjou, had defeated the Calvinists at Jarnac and Moncontour, and in 1573 was elected King of Poland, the people of which country made unavailing efforts to retain him. He found his French kingdom a prey to a civil or religious war between two factions, the Catholics under Henry of Guise, and the Huguenots under Henry of Navarre, the founder of the Bourbon dynasty. In 1575 he married a French lady, Louise, daughter of the Count of Vaudesmont. Henry having issued an edict of pacification favourable to the Protestants in 1576, the Catholics formed a general league, sworn to defend the interest of their Church even with the sacrifice of their loyalty to the king, who seems to have been justly distrusted by both parties, but thought it his policy to declare himself the head of the League. His court was disgraced by favouritism, intrigues, bigotry, and licentiousness; and his personal character was not such as to command the popular respect. Henry's brother, the Duke of Alençon, died in 1584, and, as the king had no children, the question of the succession assumed great importance; and it is thought that the Duke of Guise aspired to the throne. In 1587 Henri of Navarre gained the battle of Coutras; and soon after the Duke of Guise and his ligueurs took arms at Paris against the king, who was compelled to flee to Rouen. In 1588 the Duke of Guise was assassinated, probably by the order of Henry, who for this crime was excommunicated by the pope. The king then applied to Henry of Navarre for aid against the League, which was generously granted, and they were pressing the siege of Paris, when Henry III. was assassinated by a monk named Jacques Clément, in 1589. He was the last king of the house of Valois.

Henry IV., [often called in French HENRI LE GRAND, hɔ̃n're' lɐh grɔ̃n; Lat. HENRI'CUS MAG'NUS, i.e. "Henry the Great,"] King of France and of Navarre, and founder of the royal house of Bourbon, was born at Pau, December 14, 1553. His father was Antoine de Bourbon, Duc de Vendôme, a lineal descendant of Louis IX., and his mother was Jeanne d'Albret, only child and heiress of Henri d'Albret, King of Navarre. She was a woman of superior merit, ardently devoted to the Protestant faith, in which she educated her son. In 1569, the civil war being renewed, Henry, then styled Prince of Béarn, joined the Protestant army, led by his uncle, the Prince of Condé, (who recognized him as the chief of the party,) and was present at the battles of Jarnac and Moncontour. The Protestants having gained a victory at Arnay-le-Duc, a treacherous peace was offered by the court and accepted in 1570. To inspire the Huguenots with greater confidence, a marriage was negotiated between Henry and the king's sister Margaret. While the Queen of Navarre was making preparation at Paris for the marriage of her son, she died suddenly, in 1572, and he became King of Navarre. A few days after the marriage was celebrated occurred the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew. (See CHARLES IX.) Henry's life was spared on condition that he would adopt the Roman Catholic religion; but he was confined and strictly watched for several years. In 1576 he escaped to Rochelle, and assumed the command of his friends, then menaced by the Catholic League. He displayed great skill and bravery in several campaigns, the operations of which were, however, for the most part on a small scale. In 1587 the Huguenots gained a decisive victory at Coutras. The King of France died in 1589, and named for his successor the subject of this article, who, since the death of the king's brother, was presumptive heir of the crown. His claim was disputed by a large army under the Duc de Mayenne, and by the fanatical populace of Paris, who kindled bonfires to show their joy at the death of Henry III., and whose resistance was stimulated by Spanish gold. Baffled in his attempt to obtain possession of his capital, he marched towards Dieppe, where his army was increased by 5000 English sent by his ally Elizabeth. In 1590 he gained a decisive victory at Ivry over the Duke of Mayenne, after electrifying his army with this brief harangue: "Fellow-soldiers, you are Frenchmen; behold the enemy! If you lose sight of your ensigns, rally around my plume: you will always find it on the high road to honour!" In 1592 he defeated a Spanish army under Farnese, the celebrated Prince of Parma, near Yvetot.

His devotion to the interest of France (we may charitably suppose) now induced him to conciliate his enemies by a profession of the Roman Catholic religion in 1593,—the Protestants at the same time being assured of the continuance of his favour and protection. In 1594 he entered Paris without resistance, and granted a general pardon. After numerous battles and sieges, a treaty of peace was made at Vervins with Philip II. of Spain in 1598, and Henry was acknowledged by the whole kingdom. The same year he gave liberty of conscience to his subjects by the edict of Nantes. Directing his attention to the finances, agriculture, and industrial arts, in which he was seconded by his minister Sully, he proved himself a wise and able statesman, and rendered himself very popular by his sympathy with the lower classes and his generosity to all. His popularity was increased by the spirited and eloquent public addresses which he made on various occasions, and by the frank simplicity of his manners. In 1600 he married an Italian princess, Marie de' Medici, having obtained a divorce from his first wife. The last half of his reign was peaceful and prosperous. He founded a hospital, a college, and a public library in Paris, and encouraged learned men, among whom were Casaubon and Grotius. His memory is more cherished by the French than that of any other of their kings, and his character is regarded by them as the beau-idéal of a Frenchman, a warrior, a monarch, and a statesman. On the 14th of May, 1610, while riding in his carriage, he was assassinated by a fanatic named Ravaillac. He left the crown to his son, Louis XIII.

Henry, PRINCE OF WALES, the eldest son of James I. of England, was born at Stirling in 1594. He is represented to have been unlike his father, brave, generous, and constant, was fond of maritime adventure, and earnestly opposed to popery. He befriended Sir Walter Raleigh, and used to say that no king but his father would keep such a bird in a cage. Died in 1612.

Henry, (Heinrich,) or Friedrich Heinrich Ludwig, a Prussian prince, distinguished for his skill in strategy, born in Berlin in 1726, was a brother of Frederick the Great. He commanded the right wing at the battle of Prague, 1757, and decided the fortune of the day. He outgeneralled the enemy in the campaign of 1758, and obtained some advantages in 1759. In 1760, with 35,000 men, he held in check a superior force of Russians by skilful marches, and prevented their junction with the Austrians. He gained a signal victory at Freyburg in October, 1762, which was the last important action of the Seven Years' war. He was less enterprising as a general than his brother, who in 1763 saluted him "as the only general that in this war has not committed a single fault." Died in 1802.

Henry OF CHAMPAGNE, (shôn'pâñ',) born in 1180, was the nephew of Richard Cœur de Lion. In the third crusade he distinguished himself at the siege of Saint-Jean-d'Acre. By his marriage with Isabella, widow of Conrad of Tyre, and with the consent of the chiefs, he became King of Jerusalem. He died during the fourth crusade.

Henry OF GHENT. See GOETHALS.

Henry OF HAINAULT, [Fr. HENRI DE HAINAULT, ôn're' deh hà'nō',] born at Valenciennes in 1174, was a brother of Baldwin of Flanders. In 1202 he took part in the crusade against the Turks, and in 1206 succeeded his brother Baldwin as Emperor of Constantinople. He is represented as a brave and prudent prince. Died, without issue, in 1216.

Henry OF HUNTINGDON, an English historian, who lived about 1150, became Archdeacon of Huntingdon. He wrote a general history of England from the earliest accounts to the death of Stephen, (1154,) which was published by Sir Henry Savile in 1596. He also wrote Latin poetry, which is not without merit.

Henry (or Henrique) OF PORTUGAL. See HENRI DE BOURGOGNE.

Henry [Port. HENRIQUE, en-ree'kà] OF PORTUGAL, [Fr. HENRI DE PORTUGAL, ôn're' deh por'tü'gāl',] a celebrated patron of science, sometimes called HENRY THE NAVIGATOR, was born at Oporto in 1394. He was a younger son of John I. of Portugal, and a nephew of Henry IV. of England. He was distinguished for his attainments in mathematics, geography, and navigation. About 1419 he founded an observatory and nautical school in Algarve, and enlisted the most skilful mariners in enterprises of maritime discovery. Under his auspices the west coast of Africa was explored as far as Sierra Leone, and Madeira and the Azores were discovered. Died in 1463.

Henry (or Henrique) OF PORTUGAL, third son of Emanuel, King of Portugal, was born in Lisbon in 1512. He was educated for the church, and became Archbishop of Ev'ora in 1540. He consented to the establishment of the Inquisition in his diocese. At the death of his nephew, King Sebastian, in 1578, he succeeded to the throne. He was urged to designate which of the claimants should succeed him, but delayed, and died, without a decision, in 1580. Philip II. of Spain was his successor.

Hen'ry, (CALEB SPRAGUE,) an American author, born in Rutland, Massachusetts, in 1804, graduated at Dartmouth College in 1825. He took orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church about 1835, and became professor of philosophy and history in the New York University in 1839. He published, besides other works, "Cousin's Psychology," (1834,) and a "Compendium of Christian Antiquities," (1837.) Died March 9, 1884.

Hen'rў, (DAVID,) born at Aberdeen in 1710, removed to London at an early age, and was employed by Cave, (the publisher of the "Gentleman's Magazine,") whose sister he married in 1736. He was a frequent contributor to the above magazine, and at the death of E. Cave, in 1754, he became a partner in its management. He was the author of the "Complete English Farmer," and of a few other works. Died in 1792.

Henry, (EDWARD LAMSON,) an American artist, born at Charleston, South Carolina, January 12, 1842. He was chosen a member of the National Academy in 1869. His paintings are often on American historical and military subjects, but he has painted a considerable number of genre pictures. He has chiefly lived in New York.

Henry, ȧôN're', (ÉTIENNE OSSIAN,) a French chemist, born in Paris about 1798. He distinguished himself by researches into the action and composition of mineral waters, and gained the Montyon prize for a method of producing sulphate of quinia. He published, besides other chemical works, a "Manual of the Chemical Analysis of Mineral Waters," (1825.) Died August 24, 1873.

Henry, (JOSEPH,) an American savant and natural philosopher, born at Albany, New York, in 1799. He began a series of experiments in electricity about 1827, and is said to have invented the first machine moved by the agency of electro-magnetism. He wrote on electricity and magnetism several papers inserted in "Silliman's Journal." In 1832 he was appointed professor of natural philosophy in the College of New Jersey at Princeton. He published "Contributions to Electricity and Magnetism," (1839,) and became secretary of the Smithsonian Institution in 1846. He contributed numerous valuable papers to the various scientific periodicals in the United States. Died May 13, 1878.

Henry, (MARIE JOSEPH,) a French historian, born in Basses-Alpes in 1778, published a History of Egypt, ("L'Égypte Pharaonique," 2 vols., 1846,) and other works. Died in 1850.

Hen'rў, (MATTHEW,) an eminent English divine, born in Iscoyd township, Flintshire, in October, 1662. After receiving a liberal education, he accepted in 1687 the charge of a dissenting church in Chester. In 1712 he removed to Hackney, where he preached until his death, in 1714. He published many sermons and theological works, of which the most important is his "Commentary on the Old and New Testament," (1710.) This is thought by some to be the best work of that kind ever published. It was highly commended by Robert Hall, Dr. Doddridge, and Adam Clarke. The latter, speaking of certain abridgments of the above work, says, "Every one of them, while professing to lop off his redundancies and supply his deficiencies, falls, by a semi-diameter of the immense orb of literature and religion, short of the author himself."

See TONG, "Life of Matthew Henry," 1716; WILLIAMS, "Memoirs of the Life, Character, and Writings of M. Henry," 1828.

Henry, (NOËL ÉTIENNE,) a French chemist, father of Étienne Ossian, noticed above, was born at Beauvais (Oise) in 1769. He wrote a "Treatise on Pharmacy, Practical and Theoretical," (1828.) Died at Paris in 1832.

See "Notice biographique sur Noël Étienne Henry," by BARON SILVESTRE.

Henry, (PATRICK,) a celebrated American orator and patriot, born at Studley, Hanover county, Virginia, May 29, 1736. His father, John Henry, was a native of Scotland, and a nephew of the eminent historian Robertson. His mother's maiden name was Sarah Winston. Under his father's tuition he learned the common English branches and acquired a smattering of Latin; but he had little inclination to book-learning. In his youth he was passionately addicted to dancing, hunting, and fishing. Finding him indisposed for literary and professional pursuits, his father set him up in mercantile business about 1753. His success in trade was hindered by his negligent and indolent habits. About the age of eighteen he married a Miss Shelton. Having become insolvent, he abandoned mercantile pursuits and began to cultivate a small farm; but after an experiment of two years he sold his land and returned to merchandise. He failed again in trade about 1760, and then resolved to try the profession of the law. After he was admitted to the bar, he passed several years in poverty and obscurity; but he gained sudden distinction in 1763 by his speech against the clergy, who undertook to enforce the payment of their salaries in tobacco.* This cause, called "the Parsons' Cause," which had produced much excitement in the country, was tried before a court over which Patrick Henry's father presided as judge. "On this occasion he rose very awkwardly," says Wirt, "and faltered much in his exordium." . . . But, "as his mind rolled along and began to glow from its own action, all the exuviæ of the clown seemed to shed themselves spontaneously." The result of this plea, the first he ever made in court, was a verdict for the people.

In 1765 he was elected a member of the House of Burgesses, and offered in that body a series of resolutions against the famous Stamp Act. He advocated these resolutions by a powerful speech, in which he exclaimed, "Cæsar had his Brutus, Charles the First his Cromwell, and George the Third"—here he was interrupted by loud cries of "Treason!" from all parts of the House—"may profit by their example. If this be treason, make the most of it." His resolutions passed the House by a small majority in May, 1765. "During the period between this date and the Revolution, Mr. Henry," says Alexander H. Everett, "was constantly in advance of the most ardent patriots. He suggested and carried into effect, by his immediate personal influence, measures that were opposed as premature and violent by all the other eminent supporters of the cause of liberty." In 1774 he was chosen a delegate to the Continental Congress. Among the greatest triumphs of his unrivalled eloquence was a speech in the Virginia Convention (March, 1775) for the passage of a resolution "that the colony be immediately put in a state of defence." He insisted on the necessity of fighting for independence, and closed with the words "Give me liberty, or give me death!"

He was elected Governor of Virginia in 1776, and, by successive re-elections, held that office until 1779. In this capacity he rendered important services to the popular cause. In 1784 and 1785 he was again chosen Governor. As a member of the Virginia Convention of 1788, he opposed the adoption of the Federal Constitution, against which he made several speeches of extraordinary eloquence. He said the Constitution had "an awful squinting towards monarchy." He died June 6, 1799, leaving the reputation of the greatest of American orators. He was a devout believer in Christianity, but was not a member of any religious denomination.

Henry, (Rev. ROBERT,) a Scottish historian, born at Muirtown in 1718. He was licensed to preach in 1746, and officiated at Carlisle from 1748 to 1760. In 1768 he removed to Edinburgh, where he became minister of the New Grey-Friars' Church. From 1776 to 1790 he was colleague-minister of the Old Church. His reputation as an author is founded on his "History of Great Britain," (6 vols., 1771–93.) It embraces the period from the first invasion of the Romans to the death of Henry VIII., and is composed on an original plan, since adopted in the more popular history of Charles Knight. The plan is to treat the history of politics, of religion, of learning, of manners and customs, etc. in separate divisions. Henry's work is executed with great erudition and fidelity; but the style is not attractive. It was acrimoniously criticised by Gilbert Stuart when it first appeared, but was commended by Hume. Died in 1790.

Henry, (Rev. ROBERT,) born at Charleston, South Carolina, in 1792, graduated at the University of Edinburgh in 1814. He was chosen president of the College of South Carolina in 1842, resigned in 1845, and then became professor of Greek in that institution. He contributed to the "Southern Review." Died in 1856.

Henry, (WILLIAM,) an English chemist, born at Manchester in 1775. He graduated as M.D. at Edinburgh in 1807, and practised with success at Manchester. He had previously made valuable researches in chemistry, on which he contributed numerous memoirs to the "Philosophical Transactions" of the Royal Society. In 1803 he ascertained the law of the absorption of gases by water of different temperatures. In 1808 he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, which the next year awarded to him Sir G. Copley's donation, as a testimonial of his scientific merit. He is the author of well-written sketches of Davy, Priestley, and Wollaston; also of an excellent work, entitled "Elements of Experimental Chemistry," (1800,) which passed through many editions. His moral character is represented as excellent. Died in 1836.

Henry the Lion, [Ger. HEINRICH DER LÖWE, hīn'rĭK dĕR lö'ŵĕh,] born in 1129, was the son of Henry the Proud, Duke of Saxony, and grandson of the emperor Lothaire. On his succeeding his father, in 1146, he demanded the restoration of Bavaria, which had been wrested from his family, and which in 1154 was conceded to him. While on a crusade in Palestine, his dominions were invaded by his enemies, whereby he was involved in numerous contests after his return. He died in 1195, leaving the reputation of a wise ruler and a patron of learning and commerce. He married as his second wife Matilda, daughter of Henry II. of England.

Hens, van, văn hĕns, (ABRAHAM,) a Dutch painter of plants and insects, born at Utrecht about 1645; died after 1705.

Hensel, hĕn'sĕl, (LUISE,) a German religious poet, a sister of the following, was born at Linum, March 30, 1798; became a Roman Catholic in 1818; died at Paderborn, December 18, 1876. Her religious lyrics are prized by Protestants as well as by those of her own faith. Among the best-known are "Müde bin ich, geh' zur Ruh," and "Immer muss ich wieder lesen."

Hensel, hĕn'sĕl, (WILHELM,) a German painter, born in the province of Brandenburg in 1794. Among his best pictures are "Christ before Pilate," and excellent portraits of the Duke of Brunswick and of the composer Mendelssohn. Died in 1861. His wife, FANNY HENSEL, sister of Felix Mendelssohn, was distinguished for her skill and taste in music, and produced several admired compositions. Died in 1847.

Henselt, hĕn'sĕlt, (ADOLPH,) a German pianist and composer, born May 12, 1814, at Schwabach, in Bavaria. In 1838 he settled in Saint Petersburg, where he held the appointment of court pianist. He made few appearances in public. Died October 10, 1889.

Hĕn'shaw, (JOHN PRENTICE KEWLEY,) D.D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Middletown, Connecticut, in 1792. After graduating at Middlebury College, Vermont, in 1808, he embraced the tenets of the Episcopal Church. Through his zealous labours, several new churches were organized in Vermont. In 1817 he became pastor of Saint Peter's Church in Baltimore. He was elected Bishop of Rhode Island in 1843. Died in 1852.

Henshaw, (J. SIDNEY,) changed from J. HENSHAW BELCHER, an American lawyer and writer, born in Boston in 1814. He published, besides other works, "Philosophy of Human Progress," (1835,) and "Round the World," (2 vols., 1840.) Died in 1859.

Hensler, hĕns'lẹr, (PHILIP GABRIEL,) a Danish physician, born at Oldensworth in 1733, became physician to the King of Denmark in 1775. Died in 1805.

Hĕnsl̄ōw, (Rev. JOHN STEVENS,) a distinguished English botanist, born in 1796. He took the degree of B.A. at Cambridge in 1818, and was appointed professor of botany in that university about 1825. In 1837 he became rector of Hitcham, in Suffolk, where he continued to reside until his death. He was a popular lecturer, and contributed memoirs on botany and other parts of natural history to the Transactions of several societies. His principal productions are "Principles of Descriptive and Physiological Botany," (1835,) a work of great merit, which has been extensively used as a text-book, and a "Catalogue of British Plants." Died in 1861.

Hephæstus, he-fĕs'tus, [Gr. Ἥφαιστος; Fr. HÉPHESTE, ā'fĕst', or HAPHESTE, ă'fĕst',] the Greek name of the god VULCAN, which see.

Hephestion or Hephæstion, he-fĕs'tĭ-on, [Gr. Ἡφαιστίων,] a Macedonian courtier, the son of Amyn-tor of Pella, became a favourite of Alexander the Great, whom he followed in the invasion of Persia and India. In the return of this expedition, Hephestion and Craterus commanded a separate part of the army. When Alexander married Roxana, daughter of Darius, he gave her sister, Drypetis, to Hephestion. He died soon after that event, in 325 B.C. The grief of Alexander for his loss was so profound that he tasted no food for three days.

Hephestion, a grammarian of Alexandria, lived about 150 A.D., and wrote a treatise entitled "Enchiridion de Metris."

Heppe, hĕp'pẹh, (HEINRICH JULIUS LUDWIG,) a German rationalistic theologian, born at Cassel, March 30, 1820; became a professor of theology at Marburg; published a "History of German Protestantism," (1856–59,) "History of the German School System," "History of Quietistic Mysticism," "History of Pietism," etc., besides lives of Melanchthon and Beza, and some writings on dogma. Died July 25, 1879.

Hep'worth, (GEORGE HUGHES,) an American Congregational minister, born at Boston, Massachusetts, February 4, 1833. He graduated in 1855 at the Cambridge Divinity School. He held various Unitarian pastorates, 1855–72, (except that during the war of 1861–65 he served in the army,) and in 1872 left the Unitarian denomination. He afterwards occupied Trinitarian Congregational pulpits, chiefly in New York. Among his works are "Whip, Hoe, and Sword," (1864,) and "Rocks and Shoals," (1870.)

He'ra, [Gr. Ἥρα or Ἥρη,] a goddess of the Greek mythology, was the daughter of Cronos, (Saturn,) and the wife of Jupiter, and was identical with the Juno of the Romans. The chief seats of her worship were Argos and Samos. (See JUNO.)

Heraclitus or Heracleitus, hĕr-a-klī'tus, [Gr. Ἡράκλειτος; Fr. HÉRACLITE, à'rȧ'klĕt'; It. ERACLITO, à-rȧ-klee'to,] surnamed THE NATURALIST, a celebrated Greek philosopher, and the founder of a sect, was a native of Ephesus, and lived about 500 B.C. According to several accounts, he studied the Pythagorean philosophy under Hippasus and Xenophanes; but he professed to be self-taught. His father was one of the principal citizens of Ephesus, the chief magistracy of which was offered to Heraclitus, but was refused. The current notion that he was addicted to habitual weeping on account of the vices and follies of men, appears to be unfounded; but his gloomy and unsociable temper, or his love of study, caused him to decline intercourse with the world and to retire to the solitude of a mountain. When Darius of Persia invited him to his court, he rather rudely refused the intended honour. He founded a new school of philosophy, which did not, however, survive as a distinct school long after his own time.* His principal work was a "Treatise on Nature," of which fragments only are extant. Socrates, after reading it, said that so much of it as he could understand was good, but that he found it for the most part unintelligible. He affected an obscure and concise style, comparing himself to the Sibyl, who utters in mysterious language the austere oracles of inspiration, and received the epithet σκοτεινός, the "obscure." He taught that fire is the principle of all things; that death is only a change of form; that natural phenomena are produced by the antagonism of two opposite forces, namely, attraction and repulsion; that motion is essential to matter, and, as a result of this incessant change, "no man has ever floated twice on the same stream." He attached little value to worldly wisdom or human lore, saying that the science of men is only ignorance; their grandeur, meanness; and their pleasure, pain. He represented contentment as the chief good. He died about the age of sixty.

Heraclitus, an elegiac poet, born at Halicarnassus, lived about 250 B.C., and was a friend of Callimachus.

Hĕr-a-clī'us [Gr. Ἡράκλειος] I., a Roman Emperor of the East, son of Heraclius, Governor of Africa, born about 575 A.D., was a native of Cappadocia. By the violent death of the tyrant Phocas, in 610, Heraclius, who had served in the army with credit, obtained the imperial power; and soon after he married Eudoxia. In the early part of his reign the empire was ravaged by pestilence and the barbarian armies of Chosroës, (Khosroo,) King of Persia. In 622 he led an army against Persia, defeated Chosroës at Tauris, and fought several successful campaigns, in which he displayed great military talents and personal courage. Having made peace with Persia, he returned to Constantinople in 628, and abandoned himself to inglorious ease, sensual vices, and the subtleties of Monothelism, of which he became the supporter, while the victorious progress of the Mussulman arms threatened to subvert his empire. He died in 641. His character is a puzzle, and presents surprising contradictions.

* Nevertheless, Heraclitus may be said to have anticipated some of the most "advanced" ideas of the most distinguished physicists of the present age. After observing that the "world (Kosmos or Universe) was made neither by any of the gods, nor by any man, it was and is and ever shall be an ever-living fire, in due measure self-kindled, and in due measure self-extinguished," he goes on to say, "ALL IS CONVERTIBLE INTO FIRE, AND FIRE INTO ALL, just as gold is convertible into wares, and wares into gold." If we take the word fire to include heat, light, and electricity, (lightning,) a sense in which it was not unfrequently used by the ancients, we shall perceive a striking analogy between the thought of the preceding passage and that of the following from Herbert Spencer: "Those modes of the Unknowable which we call motion, heat, light, chemical affinity, etc. are alike transformable into each other, and into those modes of the Unknowable which we distinguish as sensation, emotion, thought: these in their turns being directly or indirectly re-transformable into the original shapes." Hĕr'ą-path, (JOHN,) an English mathematician and writer on physics, born at Bristol in 1793. He was the editor of "Herapath's Railway Journal." Besides several treatises on physics, he wrote two volumes on "Mathematical Physics," (1847.) Died in 1868.

Herapath, (WILLIAM,) an eminent English chemist, born at Bristol in 1796, was the son of a brewer, whom he succeeded in his business. He made important discoveries in toxicology, and was consulted as a chemist in the trials of persons suspected of causing death by poison. For many years he held the place of first teacher of chemistry in the Bristol Medical School. He wrote several chemical memoirs. He was a prominent Liberal in politics. Died in 1868.

His son, WILLIAM BIRD HERAPATH, (1820–68,) was a physician, author of several medical treatises, and discoverer of the polarization of light by plates of iodoquinine.

Heraud, hą'rō', ? (JOHN A.,) an English poet and dramatic writer, born in London about 1800. He produced "The Judgment of the Flood," a poem, (1834,) "Videna," a tragedy, (1854,) and other works. D. 1887.

Héraud, *h*ą'rō', [Lat. HERAL'DUS,] (DIDIER,) a French Protestant lawyer and critic, born about 1579. In youth he obtained the chair of Greek at Sedan, and afterwards practised law with success at Paris. He gained distinction as a critical scholar, and was highly eulogized by Grotius. He published notes on Martial, Minutius Felix, and Tertullian, and several other works. Died in 1649.

Hérault de Séchelles, *h*ą'rō' dęh są'shĕl', (MARIE JEAN,) a French revolutionist, born of an aristocratic family in Paris in 1760. He gained distinction as a lawyer and orator before the Revolution. Elected to the Legislative Assembly in 1791, he became a leader of the Jacobins, and was president of the Convention in June, 1793, when the Girondists were proscribed. He was the author or rédacteur of the document called the "Constitution of 1793," and was president and chief speaker at the national festival of August 10, 1793. In the same year he was a member of the sanguinary committee of public safety. Proscribed by Robespierre and accused of complicity in a conspiracy, he was executed with Danton in April, 1794. "He died," says Lamartine, "with the serenity of a just man who glories in being a martyr of liberty." He is described by Lord Brougham (in a sketch of Danton) as a man of unsullied character. He left a work entitled "Theory of Ambition," (1802.)

Herbart, hĕR'bąRt, (JOHANN FRIEDRICH,) an eminent German philosopher, born at Oldenburg in May, 1776. He was a pupil of Fichte in the University of Jena. In 1805 he published a treatise on Platonic philosophy, "De Platonici Systematis Fundamento," and became adjunct professor of philosophy at Göttingen. He produced in 1808 a "General Practical Philosophy," and "The Chief Points of Metaphysics," ("Hauptpunkte der Metaphysik.") He was professor at Königsberg from 1809 to 1833, during which period he published, besides other works, an "Introduction to Philosophy," (1814,) and "Psychology as a Science newly based on Experience, Metaphysics, and Mathematics," ("Psychologie als Wissenschaft neu gegründet auf Erfahrung, Metaphysik und Mathematik," 2 vols., 1825.) In 1833 he obtained the chair of philosophy at Göttingen. He originated a peculiar system of philosophy. Died at Göttingen in August, 1841.

Herbeck, von, fon hĕR'bĕk, (JOHANN,) an Austrian musician, conductor, and composer, born at Vienna, December 25, 1831. In 1866 he was appointed chief court capellmeister, and in 1871 director of the court opera. Died October 28, 1877.

Herbel, *h*ĕR'bĕl', (CHARLES,) a French painter and engraver, born at Nancy; died in 1703.

Herbelin, *h*ąRb'lĂN', (JEANNE MATHILDE,) an eminent French painter of miniatures, a daughter of Baron Habert, born at Brunoy about 1818. She won first-class medals at Paris in 1847 and 1855.

Herbelot, d', dĕR'blō', (BARTHÉLEMY,) an eminent French Orientalist, born in Paris in 1625. Having learned Arabic, Hebrew, Persian, etc., he was employed as Oriental secretary and interpreter by the king, who granted him a pension: he was also appointed professor of Syriac in the Collége Royal. He published a "Bibliothèque Orientale," or "Universal Dictionary, containing generally all that regards the Knowledge of the Eastern Nations," a work of great labour and erudition, which was not quite finished at his death in 1695. It was published in 1697.

Herberay, d', dĕRb'rą', (NICOLAS,) Seigneur des Essarts, a French officer, who, by order of Francis I., translated the first eight books of "Amadis de Gaule" into French, (1548.) Died about 1550.

Herberstein, von, fon hĕR'bęr-stīn', (SIGISMUND,) BARON, a German historian, born in Carniola or Styria in 1486. He was employed in several important missions, and rose to be president of the college of finance. His "Commentaries on Russian History" (Rerum Moscoviticarum Commentarii," 1549) is a valuable historical work on the early Russians. Died in 1566.

Hęr'bęrt, (Hon. ALGERNON,) an English author and lawyer, born in 1792, was the youngest son of Henry, Earl of Carnarvon. He wrote several learned works, among which are "Nimrod: a Discourse on Certain Passages of History and Fable," and "Britannia after the Romans." Died in 1855.

Herbert, (AUBERON,) an English radical politician, a son of the third Earl of Carnarvon, was born in London in 1838. He was educated at Eton, and at Saint John's College, Oxford, and served for some time in the Hussars before graduating in 1862. He sat in Parliament as a radical, 1870–74. He is an avowed republican, and an enemy of all repressive legislation. His principal book is "The Danes in Camp," (1864.)

Herbert, (EDWARD,) Lord Herbert of Cherbury, an English author and courtier, was born at Montgomery, Wales, in 1581, and was a descendant of the Earl of Pembroke. About 1610 he served in the English army in the Netherlands, and received the title of knight from James I. In 1618 he was sent as ambassador to France, where he published in 1624 his first and principal work, a Latin treatise "On Truth as it is distinguished from Revelation, from Probability, from Possibility, and from Falsehood," which Hallam represents as a "monument of an original, independent thinker," although "justly deemed inimical to every positive religion." In 1631 he was raised to the peerage. He was also the author of a "History of the Life and Reign of Henry VIII.," (1649,) which Horace Walpole calls a "master-piece of historic biography," and "The Life of Lord Herbert, written by himself," (1764.) He was reputed one of the most eminent English statesmen and philosophers of the age in which he lived. Died in 1648.

See HALLAM, "Introduction to the Literature of Europe;" HORACE WALPOLE, Preface to Herbert's Autobiography; CH. DE RÉMUSAT, "Notice of Herbert," in the "Revue des Deux Mondes," 1854; "Retrospective Review," vol. vii., 1823.

Herbert, (GEORGE,) an English poet, a brother of the preceding, was born at Montgomery, Wales, in 1593. In 1619 he was chosen public orator of Cambridge University, of which he was a graduate. Having taken orders, he was made, in 1626, prebendary of Layton Ecclesia, and in 1630 was presented by the king to the living of Bemerton. His poetical writings contain some of the finest sacred lyrics in the English language. Herbert's imagery is rich and quaint, and some critics have censured his concetti, figurative language, and occasional obscurity. His principal prose work is "The Country Parson." Coleridge remarks that "the quaintness of some of his thoughts—not of his diction, than which nothing can be more pure, manly, and unaffected—has blinded modern readers to the great general merits of his poems, which are for the most part exquisite in their kind." Died in 1632.

See IZAAK WALTON, "Life of Herbert;" WILLMOTT, "Lives of the English Sacred Poets;" "Retrospective Review," vol. iii., 1821; "British Quarterly Review" for July, 1867.

Herbert, (HENRY WILLIAM,) born in London in 1807, was the son of the Rev. William Herbert, noticed below, and a lineal descendant of the Earls of Pembroke. He emigrated to the United States in 1831. He displayed remarkable versatility of talents in his voluminous works, consisting of novels, fugitive poems, historical sketches, etc. Under the name of FRANK FORESTER, he wrote "The Field Sports of the United States," (1849,) "The Deer-Stalkers," (1849,) and other sporting works. Professor Felton represents him as "a poet of vivid imagination, a successful novelist, and an able and accomplished critic." He committed suicide in 1858.

See "North American Review," vol. lxix.

Herbert, (JOHN ROGERS,) an eminent English painter of history and portraits, was born at Maldon, Essex, in 1810. He studied in the Royal Academy, and for some years painted portraits with success. Having become a Roman Catholic, he changed his style, and devoted himself to religious subjects. He produced "The First Introduction of Christianity into Britain," (1842,) and "John the Baptist reproving Herod," (1848.) He was elected a Royal Academician in 1848, and painted frescos illustrating "King Lear" in the new palace of Westminster, about 1849. Died March 17, 1890.

Herbert, (MARY,) née SIDNEY. See SIDNEY.

Herbert, (SIDNEY,) of Lea, BARON, an English statesman of eminent merit, born in 1810, was the second son of the Earl of Pembroke. He graduated at Oxford in 1831, and entered Parliament as a Conservative in 1832. In 1841 he was appointed secretary to the admiralty, and in 1845 became secretary at war in the cabinet of Sir Robert Peel. Having gradually adopted liberal principles, he favoured the repeal of the corn-laws in 1846, and retired from office with his political chief in the summer of that year. On the formation of the Aberdeen ministry, in December, 1852, he was again appointed secretary at war. He resigned, in company with other Peelites, about February, 1855. From June, 1859, until July, 1861, (when he resigned on account of ill health,) he filled the same office in the cabinet of Palmerston, with eminent ability. As a war minister he appears to have been universally popular. In January, 1861, he was raised to the peerage, as Baron Herbert of Lea. He married about 1846 a daughter of General A'Court. He erected on his estate at Wilton a church which is an admirable model of the Italian or Romanesque style. "He combines," says the "Spectator," "with the administrative ability which is the claim of the Peelites to power, great personal tact, and enough of oratorical ability to hold his own in the House of Commons." Died August 2, 1861.

Herbert, (Sir THOMAS,) an English writer, born at York about 1608, was related to the Earl of Pembroke, who procured him an office under the ambassador to Persia in 1626. In 1634 he published a "Relation of Travels in Africa and Asia," which contains a better account of Persia than any which had previously appeared. During the civil war he was chosen by Parliament one of the commissioners to treat with the king, and in 1647 was selected by Charles I. to wait on his person in his confinement. He wrote an account of the last two years of Charles I., under the title of "Threnodia Carolina," (1678.) Died in 1682.

Herbert, (WILLIAM,) Earl of Pembroke, born at Wilton, England, in 1580, was lord-steward of the king's household about 1626. He wrote indifferent verses, and is supposed to be the person to whom Shakspeare's Sonnets were addressed. Pembroke College was named in honour of him. Died in 1630.

Herbert, (WILLIAM,) an English antiquary, born in 1718. After spending some years in London as a merchant, he went to the East Indies as purser's clerk. He is chiefly known as the editor of "Ames's Typographical Antiquities," published in 1785. Died in 1795.

Herbert, (Rev. WILLIAM,) an English author, born at Highclere Castle, Bucks, in 1778, was the third son of the Earl of Carnarvon. After distinguishing himself in the House of Commons, he took holy orders, became rector of Spofforth in 1814, and Dean of Manchester in 1840. He contributed to the "Edinburgh Review," and published a great variety of works in prose and verse, among which is an epic poem, called "Attila, King of the Huns; or, The Triumph of Christianity," (1838,) "a production," says Hallam, "displaying a union of acuteness and erudition with great poetical talents." Died in 1847.

Herbigny, d', dĕr'bèn'ye', (PIERRE FRANÇOIS XAVIER Bourguignon — boor'gĕn'yôn',) a French political writer, born at Laon in 1772, was a partisan of the Bourbons. Died in 1846.

Herbin, *h*ĕr'băn', (AUGUSTE FRANÇOIS JULIEN,) a French Orientalist, born in Paris in 1783. He excelled in the Oriental languages at a very early age. He published an Arabic Grammar, an Arabic-French Dictionary, a "History of Persian Poets," and other works. Died in 1806.

Herbinius, hĕr-bee'ne-ŭs, (JOHANN,) a learned Lutheran minister, born in Silesia in 1633. He preached at Stockholm, Wilna, etc., and published, besides other books, a curious work on cataracts and other aqueous phenomena, "De admirandis Mundi Cataractis, supra et subterraneis," etc., (1670.) Died in 1676.

Herculano de Carvalho, ĕr-koo-lä'no dà kaR-vàl'-yo, (ALEXANDRE,) a Portuguese poet and historian, born at Guimaraens about 1810, was educated in Paris. He published in 1826 "A Voz de Propheta," ("The Voice of a Prophet,") a poem. His "History of Portugal" (6 vols., 1848–52) is commended. Died in 1877.

Hercule. See HERCULES.

Hẹr'cu-lēs, [Gr. Ἡρακλῆς, (Hērakles;) Lat. HER'CULES; Fr. HERCULE, ĕr'kül'; It. ERCOLE, ĕr'ko-là,] called also Al-çī'dēs, [Gr. Ἀλκείδης,] the most celebrated hero of antiquity, was, according to Homer, the son of Jupiter and Alcmena, the wife of Amphitryon. Thebes was generally supposed to have been his birthplace. His birth is said to have been delayed by Juno because it had been ordained that of the two, Hercules and Eurystheus, the younger should serve the other. While he was an infant in the cradle, he strangled two serpents which Juno sent to destroy him. According to a popular story, when he had arrived at the age of a young man, Virtue and Pleasure appeared to him, each offering to be his guide. He preferred the former, and soon became renowned for his heroic exploits, the first of which was his victory over the lion of Cithæron. He afterwards delivered Thebes from the annual tribute of a hundred oxen which that city was required to pay to Erginus. As a reward for this service, Creon, King of Thebes, gave him his daughter Megara in marriage.

Having consulted the oracle of Apollo, he was directed to serve Eurystheus for twelve years, after which he should become immortal. Eurystheus, who regarded him with jealousy and enmity, imposed on him a number of arduous enterprises, called the Twelve Labours of Hercules. The result of his first labour was the death of the Nemean lion, which he choked in his den. He afterwards wore the skin of this animal. His next task was to kill the Lernean hydra, which infested the vicinity of Argos, and had seven (or, according to some writers, nine) heads, the middle one of which was immortal. He cut off several of its heads, but two new heads grew in place of each one amputated, until he seared the wounded part by burning. He buried the immortal head under a rock, and dipped his arrows in the gall of the hydra, so that the wounds which they inflicted were incurable. The third labour was to bring to Eurystheus a certain stag which had golden horns and was exceedingly swift of foot. He pursued it for a whole year, and at length caught it, after he had wounded it with his arrow. He was next ordered to bring alive to Mycenæ a wild boar that ravaged the vicinity of Erymanthus. He chased this animal into a snow-drift, bound him with fetters, and carried him to Eurystheus. In this expedition he encountered and vanquished the Centaurs. (See CENTAURI.) The fifth labour was to cleanse in one day the stables of King Augeas, who kept many cattle, the dung from which had accumulated for years. He performed this task by turning the rivers Alpheus and Peneus into the Augean stables. Eurystheus objected to count this among the twelve labours, because Hercules had worked for hire. (See AUGEAS.) His sixth labour was the destruction of the Stymphalian birds, which had brazen claws and beaks, discharged their feathers as arrows, and infested Lake Stymphalus in vast numbers. His seventh exploit was the capture of a mad bull which ravaged the island of Crete. He carried the bull alive to the continent and let it loose. It afterwards did much mischief at Marathon. Eurystheus next ordered him to bring from Diomedes of Thrace his horses, which fed on human flesh. The hero killed Diomedes and performed the appointed task. The subject of the ninth labour was the girdle of Hippolyte, Queen of the Amazons, which he was required to bring. He was accompanied in this expedition by Theseus and other heroes, and obtained the girdle after he had defeated the Amazons in fight. He was next commanded to bring the oxen of the monster Geryon from the fabulous island of Erythea, situated in the far-distant west. In the course of this expedition he erected on the Strait of Gibraltar two pillars, called the pillars of Hercules, and performed several exploits besides the killing of Geryon. His eleventh labour was to bring some golden apples which were guarded by a dragon in the garden of the Hesperides. He did not know where this garden was; but he obtained information from Nereus. As he was passing through Egypt in his route, he killed Busiris, the king and tyrant of that country. By the advice of Prometheus, whom he delivered from penal suffering, he sent Atlas for the apples, and supported the heavens in his place until Atlas returned with the fruit.*

The last and most dangerous service was his descent to Hades to bring up the dog Cerberus. He obtained the consent of Pluto to take the monster, provided he would not use any weapon. He accordingly seized Cerberus, carried him alive to Eurystheus, and then returned him to Pluto.

Having been affected with insanity, he consulted an oracle, which advised him to sell himself as a slave for three years. He became a slave to Omphale, Queen of Lydia, in whose service he wore the dress of a woman and was employed in spinning. He afterwards conducted a successful expedition against Troy to punish Laomedon for a breach of his promise.

He married Dejanira, (daughter of the King of Calydon,) to whom the centaur Nessus once offered violence. Hercules, with a poisoned arrow, killed Nessus, who, as he was about to die, persuaded Dejanira to preserve his blood as a love-charm. She became jealous, and applied this blood to a tunic, which he put on. He was poisoned by this garment, which produced violent pain, and stuck to his flesh when he tried to pull it off. He was about to seek relief by voluntary death on Mount Œta, when he was conveyed by a cloud to Olympus and rewarded with immortality. He was afterwards worshipped as a divinity by all the Greeks. In the character of Hercules it is difficult or impossible to distinguish the purely mythical or allegorical from what may be considered as mere exaggerations built upon a historic basis.

Herder, von, fon hĕr′dẹr, (JOHANN GOTTFRIED,) one of the most remarkable and gifted writers that Germany has produced, was born at Mohrungen, in East Prussia, in 1744. He commenced the study of surgery in Königsberg, (1762;) but, having fainted at the first operation which he witnessed, he turned his attention to theology. His thirst for knowledge was boundless, and his acquisitions embraced an immense variety of subjects. While in Königsberg, he became acquainted with Kant, who permitted him to attend his lectures without any charge. Towards the close of 1764 he was appointed teacher, and afterwards preacher, at the cathedral school in Riga. While here, he awakened in his pupils an enthusiastic attachment and devotion. In 1770 he was invited to Bückeburg, where he became court preacher, and soon acquired great distinction as a divine, in consequence of which he received a call to the professorship of theology at Göttingen. While he was still hesitating whether or not to accept the invitation, he was offered the position of court preacher, general superintendent, and counsellor of the Upper Consistory at Weimar, whither he removed in October, 1776. As an eloquent preacher, a zealous friend of education, and an encourager of rising talent, he won the esteem and love of both prince and people. The remainder of his life was spent in Weimar. In 1793 he was made vice-president, and in 1801 president, of the Upper Consistory. Died in 1803.

Among his multifarious writings there is, perhaps, not one complete work: yet he is admitted to have exercised a most important influence upon German literature, criticism, and philosophy. His greatest work (unfinished) is entitled "Ideas on the Philosophy of the History of Mankind," ("Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit.") Among his other publications we may name his "Spirit of Hebrew Poetry," ("Geist der Hebräischen Poesie,") and his "Volkslieder," a collection of the popular songs of different nations. Alluding to the difficulty of understanding or describing Herder's many-sided intellect, Richter observes, "The starry heaven no star-map paints, although painting may represent a landscape." In another place he says, "It was Herder's fault that he was not a star of the first magnitude or any other magnitude, but a clump of stars

* Several of the most remarkable exploits of Hercules are vividly described by Darwin:

"So mighty Hercules o'er many a clime
Waved his vast mace in Virtue's cause sublime;
Unmeasured strength, with early art combined,
Awed, served, protected, and amazed mankind.
First, two dread snakes, at Juno's vengeful nod,
Climbed round the cradle of the sleeping god;
Waked by the shrilling hiss, and rustling sound,
And shrieks of fair attendants trembling round,
Their gasping throats with clenching hands he holds
And Death untwists their convoluted folds.
Next in red torrents from her sevenfold heads
Fell Hydra's blood on Lerna's lake he sheds;
Grasps Achelous with resistless force,
And drags the roaring river to his course;
Binds, with loud bellowing and with hideous yell,
The monster Bull, and threefold Dog of hell.
Then, where Nemea's howling forests wave,
He drives the Lion to his dusky cave,
Seized by the throat, the growling fiend disarms,
And tears his gaping jaws with sinewy arms;
Lifts proud Antæus from his mother-plains,
And with strong grasp the struggling giant strains;
Back falls his fainting head, and clammy hair,
Writhe his weak limbs, and flits his life in air;—
By steps reverted, o'er the blood-dropp'd fen
He tracks huge Cacus to his murderous den,
Where, breathing flames through brazen lips, he fled,
And shakes the rock-roofed cavern o'er his head.
Last, with wide arms the solid earth he tears,
Piles rock on rock, on mountain mountain rears;
Heaves up huge Abyla on Afric's sand,
Crowns with high Calpe Europe's salient strand,
Crests with opposing towers the splendid scene,
And pours from urns immense the sea between.
Loud o'er her whirling floods Charybdis roars,
Affrighted Scylla bellows round his shores,
Vesuvio groans through all his echoing caves,
And Etna thunders o'er the insurgent waves"

Herman, hĕR′mȧn, (LUDIMAR,) a German physiologist, born at Berlin, October 21, 1838. In 1868 he became a professor in the University of Zurich. His chief labours have been in muscle- and nerve-physiology, in experimental toxicology, and in the study of animal electricity.

Her′mann or Her′man, (or hĕR′mȧn,) [Lat. ARMIN′IUS; Dutch, ARMIJN, ar-mīn′; Ger. ARMIN, ar-meen′,] a celebrated German hero, born 16 B.C., was the son of Sigimer, chief of the Cherusci. He is called Armenios by the Greek writers, and Arminius by the Romans. He entered the Roman army at an early age, and obtained the privileges of knighthood and of citizenship at Rome. Indignant at the oppression which his country was suffering under Quintilius Varus, then governor, he formed on his return a plan for its deliverance. By false pretences he induced the Roman commander to advance with his army beyond the Rhine, where, entangled in the forest and marshes near the Lippe, they suffered a signal defeat in 9 A.D. In 16 A.D., Germanicus, with a large army, invaded Germany, and completely defeated Hermann near Hameln, on the Weser. Nevertheless, Hermann not long after overthrew Maroboduus, (Marbod,) chief of the Suevi; but, being suspected of aiming at supreme dominion, he was assassinated by his own relatives, in the thirty-seventh year of his age. "Unlike other kings and commanders," says Tacitus, "he had the boldness to attack the Roman people, not in the beginning, but in the fulness of their power; in battle not always victorious, but unconquered in war."

Hermann, hĕr'mân, (JAKOB,) a Swiss mathematician, born at Bâle in 1678. By the favour of Leibnitz, he obtained the chair of mathematics in the University of Padua. In 1724 he accepted an invitation from Peter the Great to teach the grand duke. His principal work is a Latin "Treatise on the Forces and Movements of Solid and Fluid Bodies," (1715.) Died in 1733.

See ERSCH und GRUBER, "Allgemeine Encyklopaedie."

Hermann, ĥĕr'môn', (JEAN,) an able French naturalist, born at Barr, near Strasburg, in 1738. He obtained at Strasburg the chair of philosophy in 1778, and that of pathology in 1782. In 1784 he became professor of botany and chemistry. He wrote many short treatises on natural history, furnished materials for the large work of Buffon, and published a treatise on the affinities of animals, entitled "Tabula Affinitatum Animalium," (1783.) Died in 1800.

His son, JEAN FRÉDÉRIC, (1768–93,) wrote a thesis on Osteology, and a "Memoir on Wingless Insects," which Cuvier says "were excellent for the time."

See T. LAUTH, "Vie de Jean Hermann," 1801; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Hermann, (JOHANN GOTTFRIED JAKOB,) an eminent German philologist and critic, born at Leipsic on the 28th of November, 1772. He became in 1809 professor of eloquence and poetry at Leipsic, where his lectures on archæology and the Greek classics attracted great numbers of students. Among his principal works are "Elements of Metrical Doctrine," ("Elementa Doctrinæ Metricæ," 1816,) "On the Metres of Pindar," ("De Metris Pindari," 1817,) and "Opuscula," (7 vols., 1827–30,) consisting of essays and odes written in elegant Latin. He also prepared editions of several Greek writers, of which those of Bion and Moschus were published in 1849. Died in December, 1848.

Her-maph-ro-dī'tus, [Gr. Ἑρμαφρόδιτος; Fr. HERMAPHRODITE, ĕr'mȧ'frō'dēt',] in classic mythology, the offspring of Mercury (Hermes) and Venus, (Aphrodite,) was said to combine both sexes.

See OVID, "Metamorphoses."

Her-mar'chus, [Ἑρμαρχος,] a Greek philosopher, born in Mitylene, was a disciple of Epicurus, who bequeathed to him his garden. He succeeded Epicurus as the head of the school about 270 B.C. His works are lost.

Her'mas, a Christian writer of the first century, is supposed by some to be the person mentioned by Saint Paul in the Epistle to the Romans, chapter xvi. He lived in Italy, and wrote, in Greek, a book entitled "The Pastor, or Shepherd," composed of visions, precepts, and similitudes. It was frequently quoted and highly esteemed by the ancient Fathers of the Church. Origen, Irenæus, and Clement of Alexandria regarded it as divinely inspired. It is prized as a relic of the primitive Church, and as a medium of interesting traditions. The original is nearly all lost; but a Latin version is extant.

Hẹr'mēs, [Gr. Ἑρμῆς; Fr. Hermès, ĕr'mĕs',] the name which the Greeks gave to the herald of the gods, corresponding nearly with the Mercurius of the Roman mythology. (See Mercury.) Hermes was identified with the Egyptian Thoth or Thot, the inventor of arts and sciences. The celebrated statue of Hermes by Praxiteles was in 1878 discovered in the work of excavating the ruins of Olympia.

Hermes, hĕR'mẹs, (Georg,) a celebrated Catholic theologian, born in Westphalia, in Germany, in 1775, was the founder of a philosophical school of Christian doctrine. In 1807, when appointed professor of theology in Münster, he distinguished himself by his opposition to the system of Kant and Fichte. He became in 1820 professor at the University of Bonn, where he was highly esteemed for his abilities as a lecturer and his amiable character. He had published in 1819 his "Introduction to Christian Catholic Theology," which, though not assailing any dogmas of the Church, was made the occasion of a charge of heresy. In 1835 a brief was issued by the pope, condemning the work, and a warm controversy was long carried on between the papal and the Hermesian party. Died in 1831.

Hermes, (Johann Timotheus,) a German novelist, born in Pomerania in 1738, was the originator of the romances called psychological. His principal work is "The Journey of Sophia from Memel to Saxony," (6 vols., 1770–78.) Died in 1821.

See Ersch und Gruber, "Allgemeine Encyklopaedie."

Hermes, (Karl Heinrich,) a German historical writer, born at Kalisz, in Poland, in 1800, published a "History of the Last Twenty-Five Years," (1842; 6th edition, 3 vols., 1853.) Died October 19, 1856.

Hẹr'mēs Tris-me-ġis'tus, [Gr. Ἑρμῆς Τρισμέγιστος, Fr. Hermès Trismégiste, ĕr'mĕs' trĕs'mā'zhĕst',] called by Milton the "thrice great Hermes," the reputed author of many Greek works which were probably written in Egypt in the first three centuries of the Christian era. Some of them are still extant. According to one opinion, Hermes was an Egyptian priest; but it is now generally conceded that Hermes Trismegistus is identical with the Egyptian god Thoth, to whom the ancients ascribed the authorship of as many as thirty-six thousand books. The principal work which has come down to us under his name is "Pœmander," which treats of "the nature of all things, and of the creation of the world."

See J. H. Ursinus, "Exercitatio de Mercurio Trismegisto," 1661; Fabricius, "Bibliotheca Græca;" Baumgarten-Crusius, "De Librorum Hermeticorum Origine et Indole," 1827.

Her-mẹ-sī'ạ-năx, a Greek elegiac and erotic poet, born at Colophon, lived about the time of Alexander the Great. Only about one hundred lines of his are extant. Of these the literary quality is high. He was greatly esteemed by the ancients.

Hẹr-mī'as, (or hẹr-mī'as,) [Gr. Ἑρμείας or Ἑρμίας,] a friend and patron of Aristotle, was a slave in his youth. He became tyrant or ruler of Assos and Atarneus, in Mysia, and entertained Aristotle with honour at his court about three years, 348–345 B.C. Hermias was put to death by the King of Persia about 345 B.C. Aristotle afterwards married Pythias, the adopted daughter of Hermias, and celebrated his memory in a beautiful poem entitled a "Hymn to Virtue," which is extant.

See Diogenes Laertius; Diodorus.

Hermias, a Christian philosopher, who lived in the second century A.D. He ridiculed the pagan philosophy in a small Greek book entitled Διασυρμὸς τῶν ἔξω φιλοσόφων, a work of merit, which is still extant.

Hermida, ĕr-mee'dā, (Benito y Porras-Bermudez-Maldonado—e por'rās bĕR-moo'dĕth māl-donā'do,) a Spanish minister of state, born at Santiago in 1736. He took a prominent part at the siege of Saragossa and in resistance to the French invasion. He was chosen by the central junta minister of grace and justice in 1808. He translated "Paradise Lost" into Spanish verse, (1814.) Died in 1814.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Hermilly, d', dĕR'me'ye', (N. Vaquette,) a French littérateur, born in Paris about 1710. He translated from the Spanish Ferreras's "History of Spain," (1742,) and Camoëns's "Lusiad," (1776.) Died in 1778.

Hẹr-min'ī-us, a Roman warrior, was one of the three who defended the Sublician bridge against Porsena.

Hẹr-mī'o-ne, [Ἑρμιόνη,] in classic mythology, was a daughter of Menelaus and Helen. She was promised to Orestes, her cousin, but was married to Pyrrhus, according to some authors. After the death of Pyrrhus she became the wife of Orestes.

Hẹr-mip'pus, [Ἕρμιππος,] an Athenian poet of the old comedy, was a brother of the poet Myrtilus, and lived about 450 B.C. He inserted satires against Pericles in his plays. Plutarch says he prosecuted Aspasia for impiety.

Hermippus of Smyrna, an eminent Greek philosopher, of whom little is known, was surnamed the Callimacheian. Hence it is inferred that he was a disciple of Callimachus, and flourished about 250 or 225 B.C. He wrote the lives of Pythagoras and other philosophers, and was often quoted by ancient writers. None of his works have come down to us.

Hẹr-moc'rạ-tēs, [Gr. Ἑρμοκράτης; Fr. Hermocrate, ĕR'mo'krăt',] an eminent Syracusan general and statesman. He was one of the three generals to whom the people confided the defence of Syracuse against the Athenians in 414 B.C. Having been defeated in the first actions of the war, he and his colleagues were deprived of command. He held a high command at the naval battle of Cynossema, and was banished in 409 B.C. In an attempt to reinstate himself, or make himself master of Syracuse, he was killed there about 406 B.C. He left a high character for patriotism, energy, and incorruptibility, though his later acts in inaugurating a civil war cannot be justified.

Hẹr-moġ'e-nēs, [Gr. Ἑρμογένης; Fr. Hermogène, ĕr'mo'zhạn',] an Athenian philosopher, a son of Hipponicus, lived about 450 B.C. He is an interlocutor in the "Cratylus" of Plato.

Hermogenes surnamed Xyster, [Ξυστήρ,] a celebrated Greek rhetorician, born at Tarsus, in Cilicia, lived in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, (161–180 A.D.) He was a remarkable instance of precocious genius. At the age of fifteen he was a professor of rhetoric at Rome, and had acquired fame by his eloquent discourses. About two years later he wrote a work on Rhetoric, (Τέχνη ῥητορικὴ,) which was for a long time used as a text-book in the schools. He was author of other works on rhetoric. At the age of twenty-five he lost his memory and all capacity for usefulness, which he never recovered, though he survived many years. His works are extant.

See PHILOSTRATUS, "Vitæ Sophistarum;" FABRICIUS, "Bibliotheca Græca."

Hermogenes, a Greek architect, was a native of Alabanda, in Caria. It is not known when he lived. Vitruvius mentions him among the most eminent architects of antiquity, and as having contributed to the progress of the art by his improvements and discoveries. He invented the pseudo-dipterus, and built a temple to Diana in the city of Magnesia.

Hermogenes, a painter, lived about 170–200 A.D., and was accused of heresy by Tertullian, who wrote a book against him,—"Adversus Hermogenem." He was originally a pagan.

Hern'dọn, (WILLIAM LEWIS,) an American naval officer and writer, born in Fredericksburg, Virginia, in 1813. He entered the navy in 1828, and served in the war with Mexico. In 1851 he commenced, under the direction of the United States government, his explorations of the Amazon River. Ascending the Andes from Lima, he struck the head-waters of the Huallaga, a tributary of the Amazon, and, after nearly seven hundred miles of canoe-navigation, he entered the main channel of the great river. Forty thousand copies of his "Exploration of the Valley of the Amazon," with maps and plates, were published by Congress in 1853. In 1857, Lieutenant Herndon sailed from Havana for New York, in command of the steamer Central America, with 475 passengers and about $2,000,000 in gold. While off the coast of Georgia, the steamer, in a violent gale, sprung a leak, and he was drowned, along with the greater number of the passengers.

Herne, hẹrn, (THOMAS,) a native of Suffolk, England, a Fellow of Merton College, Oxford. He wrote several controversial works on theology. Died young in 1722.

Hernquist, hĕrn'kwist, (PEHR,) a Swedish naturalist, born in the parish of Skara in 1726, studied under Linnæus at Upsal. He founded a veterinary school at Skara, and wrote "Anatomia Hippiatrica," and other works. Died in 1808.

Hero. See HERON.

Hē'ro, [Gr. Ἡρώ,] a priestess of Venus at Sestos in Thrace, was loved by Leander, a youth of Abydos, who, it is said, swam across the Hellespont every night to visit her. He was at length drowned in a storm, and Hero, in despair, threw herself into the sea. This story has formed the subject of poems by Musæus, Schiller, and others.

Héroard, ȧ'ro'ȧr', (JEAN,) a French physician, born at Montpellier, graduated in 1575. He was patronized by Charles IX., and was afterwards first physician to Louis XIII. Died in 1627.

Hĕr'ọd, [Gr. Ἡρώδης; Lat. HERO'DES; Fr. HÉRODE, ȧ'rod'; It. ERODE, ȧ-ro'dȧ,] surnamed THE GREAT, King of Judea, born at Ascalon in 72 B.C., was the son of Antipater the Idumæan, who made him Governor of Galilee about the year 47. After the death of Julius Cæsar, he at first sided with Brutus and Cassius, but on their defeat made peace with Antony, by whose influence he was appointed King of Judea, 40 B.C. He married Mariamne, a granddaughter of the high-priest Hyrcanus. In the civil war between Octavius and Antony, Herod joined the latter, and fought for him against the Arabians, but was pardoned by the victorious Octavius. Among other acts of cruelty by which his reign was disgraced, was the execution of Hyrcanus and the brother of Mariamne, who herself at length became the victim of his jealousy. It is said he suffered great remorse for this act; but it did not restrain him from taking the life of her two sons, on which occasion Augustus remarked that he would rather be Herod's swine than his son. He erected several grand edifices in his capital, and rebuilt the Jewish temple on a magnificent scale. The birth of the Messiah, which occurred in his reign, became the signal for the indiscriminate massacre of infants recorded in Matthew, chap. ii. Herod died within a year after that event, and left the throne to his son Archelaus. His name has become proverbial for murderous violence and remorseless cruelty.

Hĕr'ọd A-grip'pạ [Gr. Ἡρώδης Ἀγρίππας] I., born about 1 A.D., was the son of Aristobu'lus by Berenice, the daughter of Herod the Great, and received a part of his education at Rome. At the accession of Caligula, in 37 A.D., he was released from prison, in which he had been confined by Tiberius, and was made ruler of several tetrarchies, viz., Abilene, Auranitis, and Trachonitis, to which in 39 Galilee was added. Under the emperor Claudius his power was increased, and he became King of Judea and Samaria. To promote his popularity with the Jews, he persecuted the Christians, as is related in the twelfth chapter of the Acts. He died suddenly in 44 A.D., when, in the language of Scripture, "he was smitten by an angel, because he gave not God the glory."

Herod Agrippa II., a son of the preceding, was born about 27 A.D. Judea having been reduced to a Roman province, the emperor Claudius gave him in 48 the kingdom of Chalcis, which was afterwards exchanged for Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, Batanæa, and other districts. His dominions were subsequently extended by Nero. The subject of this article is the Agrippa of Scripture, before whom the Apostle Paul, in the year 60, made that sublime and noble argument which almost persuaded a king to be a Christian. (Acts xxvi.) When the Jews revolted against Vespasian, Herod Agrippa adhered to the Romans; and after the capture of Jerusalem he retired to Rome, where he died about 100 A.D.

See JOSEPHUS, "History of the Jews."

Hĕr'ọd An-ti'pas, [Gr. Ἡρώδης Ἀντίπας,] son of Herod the Great and Malthace, after his father's death obtained the office of Tetrarch of Galilee, with the consent of the emperor Augustus. Having married the daughter of an Arabian prince, (Aretas,) he divorced her in 33 A.D., and took in her place Herodias, the wife of his brother Philip, who was then living. For this sinful act John the Baptist reproved him, and was put to death. (Mark vi. 17–28.) His interview with the Saviour, who was sent to him by Pilate and treated with indignity, is related in the twenty-third chapter of Luke. Herod was banished in 40 A.D. by Caligula, and died in obscurity.

He-ro'dēs, (TIBERIUS CLAUDIUS ATTICUS,) [Fr. HÉRODE ATTICUS, à'rod' à'te'küs',] an Athenian orator and statesman, born at Marathon about 110 A.D., was the son of Julius Atticus, from whom he inherited a large fortune. Having gained distinction as a rhetorician, he gave public lectures on eloquence at Athens, which were attended and admired by the élite of that city, and was employed by the emperor Antoninus Pius as tutor of his adopted sons, M. Aurelius and Lucius Verus. He became a Roman consul in 143, married a Roman lady named Annia Regilla, and a few years after returned to Greece. He built a theatre or Odeon at Athens, and other costly edifices in different places of Greece and Asia. He is said to have been the greatest orator of his time. His speeches and writings are all lost, except one harangue printed in Gruter's collection in 1609. He died about 185 A.D.

He-ro'dēs Phil-ip'pus, a son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, was the first husband of Herodias, the persecutor of John the Baptist. He is called simply Philip by the Evangelists. (See Matthew xiv. 3, Mark vi. 17, and Luke iii. 19.)

He-ro'dĭ-an, [Gr. Ἡρωδιανός; Lat. HERODIA'NUS; Fr. HÉRODIEN, à'ro'de'ăN',] a historian of the third century, is thought to have lived at Rome, and to have performed a respectable part in political affairs; but the time and place of his birth are not known. He wrote, in Greek, a history of the Roman emperors whose reigns he had witnessed, comprising the period from 180 A.D. to 238, in which no less than seventeen emperors assumed the purple. His work, which is extant, is commended for veracity, moderation, and elegance of diction, and is the more prized as it is almost the only contemporary account of that eventful period.

HÉRODIEN, à'ro'de'ăN',] a celebrated grammarian of the second century after Christ, was a son of Apollonius Dyscolus, and was born at Alexandria. He became a resident of Rome, and enjoyed the favour of Marcus Aurelius. He wrote many works on grammar, which are not extant. Fragments of some of them have been preserved. His work on prosody (Μεγάλη Προσωδία) was highly prized.

He-rod'o-tus, [Gr. Ἡρόδοτος; Fr. HÉRODOTE, à'ro'-dot'; Ger. HERODOT, hä'ro-dot; It. ERODOTO, à-rod'-o-to,] a celebrated Greek historian, born at Halicarnassus, a Dorian colony in Caria, about 484 B.C. He was the son of Lyxus and Dryo, and the nephew of the poet Panyasis. He is the earliest of the Greek historians whose works have been preserved entire, and is frequently styled "the Father of History." Cicero mentions him as "the first who adorned this species of composition." Little is known of his life, except what may be collected from his writings. Before he attained the age of thirty he took a prominent part in the expulsion of Lygdamus, the tyrant of Halicarnassus. But, having failed to gain the popular favour, he soon left his native country, spent a few years in Athens, and settled in the Athenian colony of Thurium, in Italy, in 443, where he is said to have died. Before he wrote his great national work (one of the most precious memorials of antiquity) he prepared himself by travelling over the principal countries of the civilized world, viz., Egypt, Tyre, Babylon, Asia Minor, Greece, and Italy, and by studying their manners, customs, and institutions. Throughout his narrative, however, he maintains a modest reserve respecting the extent of his travels; and it is a doubtful question in what period of his life they were performed. The principal subject of his history is the war between the Greeks and Persians, comprised in a period of sixty-eight years, from the time of Cyrus the Great to the triumph of the Greeks in 478 B.C. By way of episode, he inserts sketches of the different nations which he had visited in person. His account of Egypt is the most abundant and reliable source from which we derive our knowledge of the ancient history of that country. He is more highly appreciated by the moderns than he was by his contemporaries. Some of his marvellous stories which once excited ridicule and incredulity have been confirmed by modern discoveries. His work is pervaded by a deep religious sentiment, and by a liberal spirit towards foreigners. He unites in a high degree accuracy of observation, rectitude of intention, and the faculty of graphic description. His style is easy, natural, and sometimes poetical. Plutarch and Eusebius state that Herodotus recited his history at a public festival of the Athenians, who rewarded him with a present of ten talents. "Of the romantic historians," says Macaulay, "Herodotus is the earliest and the best. His animation, his simple-hearted tenderness, his wonderful talent for description and dialogue, and the pure, sweet flow of his language, place him at the head of narrators. He reminds us of a delightful child. . . . But he has not written a good history. . . . The faults of Herodotus are the faults of a simple and imaginative mind. . . . He wrote as it was natural that he should write. He wrote for a nation susceptible, curious, lively, insatiably desirous of novelty and excitement; for a nation in which the fine arts had attained their highest excellence, but in which philosophy was still in its infancy." Herodotus, a Greek physician, who practised at Rome probably about 100 A.D., left works which are often cited by Galen.

Héroet, ā'ro'ā', (ANTOINE,) a French poet, born in Paris, became Bishop of Digne in 1552. Died in 1568.

Herold, hā'rolt, (JOHANN BASIL,) a German writer and Protestant minister, born at Hochstädt, on the Danube, in 1511, edited a good edition of the Latin works of Petrarch, (1581,) and several original treatises. Died about 1570.

See BAYLE, "Historical and Critical Dictionary."

Hérold, ā'rold', (LOUIS JOSEPH FERDINAND,) an eminent French composer, born in Paris in 1791. He produced, in 1826, "Marie," an opera, which was completely successful. His capital works are "Zampa," (1831,) and "Le Pré aux Clercs," (1832.) He is called one of the first among modern French composers. Died in 1833.

See FÉTIS, "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens."

He'ron or He'ro, [Gr. Ἥρων,] an eminent mathematician and writer, lived in Alexandria about 100 B.C. He obtained a high reputation by his skill in geometry, mechanics, pneumatics, etc., on which he wrote several treatises. One of these mentions a machine of which steam is the motive power. His name is rendered familiar by connection with the experiment in pneumatics called "Hero's fountain." Another philosopher of this name, who is supposed to have lived in the seventh century, was noted as a writer on warlike machines, on geometry, and on military tactics.

Hĕr'on, (ROBERT,) a Scottish writer, born at New Galloway in 1764, wrote a "History of Scotland," a "Universal Geography," etc. He also translated several works, and contributed to periodicals. Died in 1807.

Héron de Villefosse, ā'rôN' dẹh vēl'foss', (ANTOINE MARIE,) a French engineer, born in Paris in 1774, became inspector-general of mines in 1807, and published a useful work, entitled "On Mineral Riches," ("De la Richesse minérale," 3 vols., 1810–19.) Died in 1852.

Hérophile. See HEROPHILUS.

He-roph'I-lus, [Gr. Ἡρόφιλος; Fr. HÉROPHILE, ā'ro'fēl',] a celebrated physician of Chalcedon, in Bithynia, was born about 344 B.C., and lived in Alexandria in the reign of Ptolemy Lagus. He was contemporary with Erasistratus, and is accounted the greatest anatomist of antiquity, as well as the first who dissected human subjects. He enriched the science with many discoveries in the nervous system, the arterial pulsations, the lacteal vessels, and the structure of the eye. The term retina originated with him. His writings are all lost, except extracts made from them by Galen and Cœlius Aurelianus.

He-ros'trạ-tus or E-ros'trạ-tus, [Gr. Ἡρόστρατος; Fr. HÉROSTRATE, ā'ros'trāt',] an incendiary, who, to immortalize his name, set fire to the temple of Diana at Ephesus, in 356 B.C. The authorities of Ephesus vainly attempted to frustrate his design by ordering that his name should never be mentioned.

Herpin, ĕr'păN', (JEAN CHARLES,) a French writer on rural economy, born at Metz in 1798. Died in 1872.

Herregouts, hĕR'goo', (HENRI,) a Flemish historical painter, born at Malines in 1666, worked mostly at Antwerp. Lacaze praises his design, colour, and the expression of his figures. Among his works are "The Last Judgment," and a penitent Magdalene. He had a son, called HERREGOUTS LE JEUNE, ("the Younger,") who was a skilful painter.

Herrenschwand, hĕr'rẹn-shw̆ânt', (JEAN FRÉDÉRIC,) born at Morat, in Switzerland, in 1715, became physician to Stanislas, King of Poland. Died in 1796.

Herrera, ĕr-rā'rȧ, (ALONZO,) a Spanish painter of religious subjects, born at Segovia in 1559.

Herrera, de, dȧ ĕr-rā'rȧ, (FERNANDO,) an eminent Spanish poet, surnamed THE DIVINE, born at Seville about 1534. Very little is known of his history. He was one of the most popular lyric poets of his time,—which is accounted the golden age of Spanish poetry. He made bold innovations in poetical language. "Herrera was a poet," says Bouterwek, "of powerful talent. But amid traits of real beauty his poetry everywhere presents marks of affectation." According to Hallam, "his odes appear to possess a lyric elevation and richness of phrase derived in some measure from the study of Pindar. Those on the battle of Lepanto are the most celebrated; they pour forth a torrent of resounding song in those rich tones which the Castilian language so abundantly supplies." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") His poems were published collectively in 1582. He died about 1595, or, as others say, in 1589.

Herrera, de, (FRANCISCO,) surnamed EL VIEJO, ("the Elder,") a skilful Spanish painter, born at Seville in 1576. He studied under Luis Fernandez, and reformed the style of the Seville school. He excelled in design, colouring, and rapidity of execution. He founded a new school, in which the famous Diego Velasquez was his pupil. Among his works is the "Last Judgment," in the church of San Bernardo, Seville. Died in 1656.

Herrera, de, (FRANCISCO,) surnamed EL MOZO, ("the Younger,") a son of the preceding, born at Seville in 1622, was a painter and architect. After studying at Rome, he worked at Seville, where he painted for the churches. In 1660 he was chosen vice-president of the Academy, of which Murillo was president. Impatient of the presence of a superior, he removed to Madrid, where he gained a high reputation in oil-painting and fresco. He was appointed principal painter to Philip IV. "The Assumption of the Virgin," a fresco at Madrid, is one of his most admired works. Died in 1685.

Herrera, de, dȧ ĕr-rā'rȧ, (JOSÉ JOAQUIN,) a Mexican, born in the eighteenth century, became President of Mexico about the end of 1844, was deposed in December, 1845, and re-elected in June, 1848. Died in 1851.

Herrera, de, (JUAN,) an eminent Spanish architect, who was employed on the Escurial after 1567. He built the royal pleasure-house at Aranjuez. According to Prescott, he was the pupil of Toledo, and completed the Escurial, begun by that architect. Died in 1597.

See PRESCOTT, "History of Philip II.," vol. iii.

Herrera-Barnuevo, ĕr-rā'rȧ baR-nwā'vo, (SEBASTIANO,) a Spanish painter and sculptor, born at Madrid in 1619, worked for the king in the Escurial. He excelled in design and colour. Died in 1671.

Herrera y Tordesillas, ĕr-rā'rȧ e toR-dȧ-sēl'yȧs, (ANTONIO,) an eminent Spanish historian, born at Cuellar in 1549, was the son of a man named Tordesillas; Herrera was the name of his mother. Philip II. gave him the title of first historiographer of the Indies and of Castile. He published in 1601 his "General History of the Acts of the Castilians on the Islands and Terra Firma of the Ocean from 1492 to 1554," (4 vols.) His work is praised by Dr. Robertson for its accuracy and candour, and has served as the guide of later historians who have treated of that period. He wrote several other historical works. Died in 1625.

Herreros, ĕr-rā'rŏs, (MANUEL Breton de los—brȧ-tôn' dȧ lŏs,) a popular Spanish poet, born at Quel, in Logroño, about 1798. He produced in 1824 a successful comedy, "A la Vejez Viruelas," and in 1834 was chosen keeper of the National Library in Madrid. He composed and translated many dramas, remarkable for grace and energy of diction, for comic power, and for true portraiture of character. He also wrote successful satires, among which is "The Carnival." Died in 1873.

See JAMES KENNEDY, "Modern Poets and Poetry of Spain," 1852.

Herrgott, hĕr'got, (MARQUARD,) a monk and antiquary, born at Friburg, in Brisgau, in 1694. He acquired a great reputation by his writings, among which are a history of the House of Hapsburg, ("Genealogia diplomatica Gentis Habsburgicæ," 2 vols., 1738,) and "Monuments of the Imperial House of Austria," (3 vols., 1750–60,) with plates. Died in 1762.

Herrich Schäffer or Schaeffer, hĕr'riK shĕf'fẹr, (GOTTLIEB AUGUST,) a German entomologist, born at Ratisbon in 1799, has published, among other works, a continuation of Panzer's "Fauna Insectorum Germaniæ," and "Nomenclator Entomologicus." Died in 1874.

Hĕr'rick, (ROBERT,) an English poet and clergyman, born in London in 1591. For about twenty years he was vicar of Dean Prior, in Devonshire, from which he was ejected by Cromwell. In 1648 he published a volume of poems, entitled "Hesperides; or, Poems Human and Divine." Of these, the tenor is often amorous, and in some parts indelicate. "Herrick has," says Hallam, "as much variety as the poetry of kisses can well have. He has much of the lively grace that distinguishes Anacreon and Catullus." Few critics will deny that as a writer of light lyrics Herrick takes the very first place in English literature. He was restored to his living in 1662. Died in 1674.

Hĕr'rick, (SAMUEL EDWARD,) D.D., an American divine, born at Southampton, New York, April 6, 1841. He graduated at Amherst College in 1859, studied at Princeton Theological School, and after 1853 held various Presbyterian and Congregational pastorates, chiefly in Boston. His principal publication is "Some Heretics of Yesterday," (1884.)

Herrick, (SOPHIE MACILVAINE BLEDSOE,) a daughter of A. T. Bledsoe, (q. v.) She was born at Gambier, Ohio, March 26, 1837. She was assistant editor and publisher of the "Southern Review," (1875–78,) and in 1878 became one of the editors of "Scribner's Magazine," afterwards called "The Century." She has published a large number of scientific papers, etc., and a volume called "The Wonders of Plant-Life," and is also well known as a designer and illustrator. Her scientific drawings from the microscope are remarkably fine.

Herries, hĕr'rĭz, (JOHN CHARLES,) a British financier, born about 1780. He became secretary of the treasury in 1823, and in 1827 chancellor of the exchequer in the ministry of Goderich, which was dissolved in 1828. He was secretary of war in a Tory cabinet for a few months in 1834 and 1835, and was afterwards a prominent member of the protectionist party. In 1852 he was appointed president of the India Board. Died in 1855.

Herrig, hĕr'rĭG, (HANS,) a German poet and dramatist, born at Brunswick, December 10, 1845. Besides a number of tragedies and dramatic poems, he published "Die Schweine," (1876,) a pessimistic poem, "Mähren und Geschichten," (1879,) in verse, and the widely popular "Lutherspiel," (1883.) Died May 4, 1892.

Hĕr'ring, (JOHN FREDERICK,) an English painter of animals, was born in Surrey in 1795. He was a coach-driver in his youth. He excelled in the representation of horses, hounds, and other animals. For many years he painted the winners at the Doncaster races. Among his works are "The Country Bait," "The Roadside," "The Members of the Temperance Society," and "The Baron's Charger." Died in 1865.

Herring, (THOMAS,) an English prelate, born in Norfolk in 1691. He became Bishop of Bangor in 1737, Bishop of York in 1743, and Archbishop of Canterbury in 1747. His sermons and letters were published, 1763–77. Died in 1757.

Herrliberger, hĕR'le-bĕRG'ẹr, (DAVID,) an able Swiss engraver, born at Zurich in 1697. He published a "New Topographical Description of Switzerland," with plates. Died in 1777.

Hĕr'rọn, (FRANCIS J.,) an American general. He served at the battle of Pea Ridge, March, 1862, and was appointed a brigadier-general in the same year. He commanded at the battle of Prairie Grove, Arkansas, in December, 1862.

Hersan, hĕR'sŏN', (MARC ANTOINE,) a French professor and Latin poet, born at Compiègne in 1652. His Latin verses were published under the title of "Selecta Carmina." Died in 1724.

Herschel, hẹr'shẹl, (CAROLINE LUCRETIA,) born in Hanover in 1750, was sister of Sir William Herschel, whom she assisted in his astronomical observations and computations. She lived with him near Windsor, England, from 1772 until his death, sharing his daily labours and nightly vigils, and inscribed her name with indelible and luminous characters in the records of astronomy. She has the credit of discovering five new comets between 1786 and 1797. In 1798 she published a valuable "Catalogue of Five Hundred and Sixty-One Stars observed by Flamsteed." In 1828 the Astronomical Society awarded her a gold medal for her Catalogue of Nebulæ and Clusters of Stars. Died in 1848.

Herschel, (Sir JOHN FREDERICK WILLIAM,) an eminent astronomer and philosopher, the only son of Sir William Herschel, was born at Slough, near Windsor, in 1792. He was educated in Saint John's College, Cambridge, where he displayed superior talents for mathematics. Between 1825 and 1833 he spent eight years in reviewing the nebulæ discovered by his father, of which he published a "Catalogue arranged in the Order of Right Ascension," (1833.) He produced in 1830 an excellent "Preliminary Discourse on the Study of Natural Philosophy," which acquired a great popularity and is a standard work. "This discourse," says the "London Monthly Review," "as a collection of important facts interesting to every human being, is without a rival."

In 1834 he established, at his own expense, an observatory at Cape Town, Africa, where he passed four years in the survey of the heavens with a reflecting telescope of twenty feet focus and eighteen and one-quarter inches clear aperture. The Royal Society awarded him a gold medal in 1836. He published in 1847 "Results of Astronomical Observations made during 1834–38 at the Cape of Good Hope, being the Completion of a Telescopic Survey of the Whole Surface of the Visible Heavens," one of the most important astronomical works of the nineteenth century. His "Outlines of Astronomy" (1849) was received with favour, and has passed through five or more editions. He edited an important collection of treatises, entitled "Manual of Scientific Inquiry," (1849,) published by the government. Sir John was appointed master of the mint in 1850, but resigned his office in 1855. The same year he was chosen a foreign associate of the Institute of France. Among his later works are "Essays from the Edinburgh and Quarterly Reviews," (1857,) the articles "Meteorology" and "Physical Geography" in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," (1857–59,) and "Familiar Lectures on Scientific Subjects," (1866.) Died in 1871.

"Sir John Herschel," says the "London Journal of Science" for April, 1868, "combines in his own person the assiduous astronomical observer, the acute mathematician, the deep-thinking philosopher, and the graceful poet. It is not to many men that intellectual powers of so high order have been given; it is not in many men that we find such perfect balancing of those varied powers; it is in few men that we discover such profound humility and such a deep sense of reverence for the Creator of those works the study of which has been a life-labour of love. . . . Sir John Herschel has ever maintained the serene dignity of a true philosopher, and his utterances of truths which have inspired him with their divinity have ever been received with delight by those who have listened to his subdued but impressive eloquence."

Herschel, (Sir WILLIAM,) one of the greatest astronomers that any age or nation has produced, was born at Hanover on the 15th of November, 1738. His father was Jacob Herschel, a skilful musician, who, having six sons, was not able to give them a very complete education. They all, however, became excellent musical performers, and William adopted the profession of musician. Before he left the paternal roof he took lessons in French and cultivated a taste for metaphysics. In 1759, in company with his brother Jacob, he went to England in search of employment; but for two or three years he received no encouragement, and suffered great privation. About 1761 he was employed to instruct a military band at Durham, or in that vicinity, and in 1765 obtained the situation of organist at Halifax. Here, by intense study, he learned Latin and Italian and acquired a thorough knowledge of mathematics. The last science he studied as preliminary to the theory of music. In 1766 he became organist of the Octagon Chapel, Bath, where his skill was in great request at oratorios, public concerts, and reunions of fashion. It appears that he was about thirty years of age before he directed his attention to astronomy and optics, in which his talents found their most congenial arena and the basis of his permanent renown. A casual view of the starry heavens through a small telescope sufficed to rouse his enthusiasm and to kindle the latent ardour of genius. He must be an astronomer; he must have a telescope of greater power; and, as the price demanded by opticians exceeded his resources, he resolved to construct one with his own hands. After a multitude of trials and several years of persistent application, he completed in 1774 a reflecting telescope of five feet focal length, and, stimulated by this success, did not relax his efforts until he obtained one of dimensions four times greater, with which in 1779 he began a systematic survey of the sidereal universe.

His arduous vigils and well-directed labours were rewarded in March, 1781, by the discovery of a new primary planet, which was named by him Georgium Sidus, in honour of King George, and is since called Uranus. Besides the éclat thrown around his name by this signal success, he received from George III. a pension of £400, with the title of private astronomer to the king. He was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, who awarded to him their annual gold medal. Herschel now fixed his residence at a village near Windsor, named Slough,—"a name," says Arago, "which the sciences will transmit to the remotest posterity; for there exists no spot on the earth which has been rendered memorable by more numerous and surprising discoveries." Continuing his observations with unremitting assiduity, he discovered two new satellites of Saturn and six satellites of Uranus. He measured the rotation of Saturn, and observed the volcanic structure of the lunar mountains and the surprising phenomena of Saturn's ring. After he had made several telescopes of twenty feet focal length, he completed, in 1789, with pecuniary aid from the king, his gigantic instrument of forty feet in length, which was far superior to any that had previously been made.

He was now enabled to penetrate farther into space than his predecessors, and by his sublime speculations on the constitution of the nebulæ he made some approach to a conception of the illimitable extent and variety of the celestial phenomena. In 1803 he ascertained the motion of the double stars around each other,—the grandest fact in sidereal astronomy,—attesting the universal influence of that attractive force which binds the members of the solar system. He soon after announced that the whole solar system is progressing in the direction of the constellation Hercules. Between 1780 and 1820 he contributed seventy-one memoirs to the "Philosophical Transactions." His discoveries were so far in advance of his time, they had so little relation or resemblance to those of his predecessors, that he may be said to have initiated a new era in astronomy, and almost to have founded a new science, by revealing the immensity of the scale on which the universe is constructed. He was married in 1788, and left one son, Sir John, noticed above. Died in August, 1822.

Hęr'vey, (AUGUSTUS JOHN,) third Earl of Bristol, son of Lord John, noticed below, was born in 1724. He became a post-captain in 1747, and displayed courage in several battles in the Mediterranean and in the West Indies. In 1771 he was appointed one of the lords of the admiralty, and in 1775, by the death of an elder brother, became Earl of Bristol. Soon after this he was created an admiral. He died in 1779, and his title was inherited by his brother Frederick, Bishop of Derry.

Hervey, (ELEONORA LOUISA,) an authoress, whose maiden name was MONTAGUE, born at Liverpool in 1811. She began to write graceful verses for the periodicals at an early age, and published in 1839 "The Landgrave," a dramatic poem. In 1843 she was married to Thomas K. Hervey, noticed below. Among her works are tales in prose, entitled "Margaret Russell," (1849,) and "The Pathway of the Fawn," (1851.)

Hervey, (FREDERICK,) fourth Earl of Bristol, born in 1730, was a brother of Augustus John, noticed above. He became Bishop of Derry in 1768, and succeeded to the earldom on the death of his brother, in 1779. He was eccentric in habits, and was a liberal patron of the fine arts. Died at Albano, Italy, in 1803.

Hervey, (JAMES,) an English divine and author, born at Hardingstone, near Northampton, in 1714, was educated at Oxford University, and was a good classical scholar. Having taken orders, he became curate of Dummer in 1736, and of Bideford in 1738. From 1743 until 1750 he was curate of Weston Favell, of which his father was rector, and at the death of the latter, in 1752, the son obtained that living. He was noted for piety and benevolence. His "Meditations and Contemplations," published in 1746, were extensively popular, notwithstanding his faulty style, which is too flowery and sublimated to please the most correct taste. These very faults probably rendered him a greater favourite with the common people, as Southey represents the book as equally "laudable in purport and vicious in style, and therefore one of the most popular that ever was written." It is or was generally found on the shelves of English cottages by the side of the Bible and "Pilgrim's Progress." Hervey also wrote "Theron and Aspasia, a Series of Dialogues and Letters," and a few minor works. Died in 1758.

Hervey, (Lord JOHN,) an English writer, born in 1696, was the eldest son of the first Earl of Bristol. He obtained a seat in Parliament soon after the accession of George I., and in 1730 became a privy councillor. In 1733 he was raised to the peerage, as Baron Hervey of Ickworth, and in 1740 was appointed lord privy seal in the cabinet of Walpole. He wrote able political pamphlets, verses, and an "Epistle from a Nobleman to a Doctor of Divinity," the last of which was an answer to Pope, who satirized him, in the character of Sporus, as "the mere white curd of asses' milk." He also wrote interesting "Memoirs of the Court of George II." Died in 1743.

See HORACE WALPOLE, "Royal and Noble Authors;" "Edinburgh Review" for October, 1848.

Hervey, (THOMAS KIBBLE,) an English poet and editor, born in Manchester in 1804. He studied at Cambridge and Oxford. In 1824 he published "Australia, and other Poems," which was received with favour. His "Poetical Sketch-Book" appeared in 1829. He afterwards produced "Illustrations of Modern Sculpture," (1832,) a work of merit, and "The Book of Christmas," (1836.) From 1846 to 1854 he was chief editor of the "Athenæum." Died in February, 1859.

Heshâm, (Heschâm,) hĕsh-âm', or Hishâm, hish-âm', (or, more fully, Heshâm-Ibn-Abd-el-Malek, hĕsh-âm' ĭb'n ăbd-el măl'ek, i.e. "Heshâm the son of Abd-el-Malek,") the tenth caliph of the house of Omeyyah, succeeded his cousin, Omar II., in 724 A.D. During the reign of Heshâm, Abd-er-Rahman, one of his generals, invaded France, where he was defeated and slain by Charles Martel, October 25, 732. Heshâm died in 743, leaving the reputation of an eminently just and virtuous sovereign.

See WEIL, "Geschichte der Chalifen," vol. i. chap. xiv.

Heshâm (or Hishâm) I., (or, more fully, Heshâm-Abool (-Aboul or -Abûl) -Waleed, (-Walîd,) â'bōōl wâ-leed',) second Emir or King of Córdova of the Omeyyah dynasty, succeeded his father, Abd-er-Rahman, in 788 A.D. He waged a successful war against the Christians of Galicia, Astorga, etc., founded schools, and promoted the arts. Died in 796.

Heshâm (or Hishâm) II., (El- (or Al-, âl) Muyyed-Billah, el mōō'e-yed bil'lạh,) sometimes corrupted into ISSAM or ISSEM by the Spanish historians, was born in 965, and succeeded his father, Hakem II., on the throne of Córdova, in 976 A.D. In his minority the kingdom enjoyed prosperity under the ministry of the famous Al-Mansoor, who gained victories over the Kings of Leon and Navarre. After the death of Al-Mansoor the reign was disturbed by rebellions and anarchy, and the feeble king became a prisoner of Soleimân, and died, or was killed, about 1012.

Heshâm (or Hishâm) III., (El-Mo'tad-Bil'lah, or Al-Mutadd- (âl mōō'tâd) Billah,) became King of Córdova in 1026, and was the last of the Omeyyah dynasty. Several nobles having refused allegiance to him, he attempted, without success, to subdue them by arms. In 1031 a sedition in the capital forced him to abdicate. Died in 1036.

Heshusius, hēs-hoo'ze-ûs, (TILLEMANNUS,) a German Lutheran divine, born at Wesel in 1526, was an opponent of Calvinism. Died in 1588.

Hesiod, hee'she-ọd, [Gr. Ἡσίοδος; Lat. HE'SIODUS; Fr. HÉSIODE, à'ze'od'; Ger. HESIOD, hā'ze-ot; It. ESIODO, à-śee'o-do,] an eminent Greek poet, born at Ascra, in Bœotia, at the foot of Mount Helicon, lived probably about 800 B.C. According to most modern critics, his period was posterior to that of Homer, with whom some writers have conjectured that he was contemporary. From his own writings the fact is derived that he was a competitor in a poetical contest at Chalcis on the occasion of the funeral of Amphidamas, and that he gained the prize. It appears that he was employed in pastoral and rural pursuits, his knowledge of which is evinced by his most famous poem, entitled Ἔργα καὶ Ἡμέραι, ("Works and Days.") This work contains reflections and precepts on farming and rural economy, interspersed with maxims of morality and mythical fables. Aristotle, Plato, and Cicero eulogize this poem, and Virgil derived from it the idea of his "Georgics," in which he has surpassed his model. According to Pausanias, the Bœotians regarded this as the only genuine work of Hesiod. The other poems commonly ascribed to the Ascræan bard are entitled "Theogony" and "The Shield of Hercules." The former purports to be an account of the origin of the world and the birth of the gods, and is the most ancient composition we have on the subject of Greek mythology. It is characterized by a rude simplicity which sometimes rises into sublimity, and by that speculative tendency which was afterwards so largely developed in the Hellenic philosophy. "The Shield of Hercules" is a fragment or collection of fragments, supposed to be written by different authors. Quintilian says, apparently in reference to the "Works and Days," "He is distinguished by useful sentences of morality and a sweetness of expression, and he deserves the palm in the middle style of writing." According to Plutarch, Hesiod was murdered at Locris, in revenge for a crime of which he was erroneously suspected.

He-sī'ọ-ne, [Gr. Ἡσιόνη,] a daughter of Laomedon, King of Troy. The poets feigned that Hercules delivered her from a sea-monster after her father had promised to give him the horses he had received from Jupiter; but Laomedon failed to keep his word. She became the wife of Telamon and mother of Teucer.

Hesiri, the old Egyptian name of OSIRIS.

Hesnault or Hénault, à'nō', (JEAN,) a French poet, born in Paris, was educated by Gassendi. He appears to have been an Epicurean or materialist. In 1670 he published a volume of sonnets, letters, etc. He translated a large part of Lucretius. Died in 1682.

Hesperiden. See HESPERIDES.

Hes-pĕr'ĭ-dēs, [Gr. Ἑσπερίδες; Fr. HESPÉRIDES, ĕs'pà'rèd'; Ger. HESPERIDEN, hĕs-pà-ree'dẹn,] the "children of Hesperus," (or "of the evening,") the name of three or four celebrated nymphs of classic mythology, who guarded the golden apples growing in an enchanted garden in the western part of the world. According to some authors, they were the daughters of Atlas, and hence were called ATLAN'TIDES. A large dragon assisted them to guard the golden apples which were the subject of one of the twelve labours of Hercules.

Hes-pe'rĭ-us, a Roman civil officer, was a son of the poet Ausonius. He was proconsul of Africa about 376 A.D., and afterwards prætorian prefect of Rome.

Hes'pẹ-rus, [Gr. Ἑσπερος; Fr. HESPER, ĕs'pair', or HESPÉROS, ĕs'pà'ros',] a personage of classic mythology, said to be a son or brother of Atlas. According to one tradition, he ascended Mount Atlas to observe the stars, and disappeared. He received divine honours, and was identified with the evening star. One account says he came to Italy, which received from him the name of Hesperia.

Hĕss, (JOHANN JAKOB,) one of the most eminent of the Swiss Protestant theologians, was born in Zurich in 1741. He wrote, in German, "The Three Last Years of the Life of Jesus," (6 vols., 1768–73; 8th edition, 1828,) "On the Kingdom of God," (1774,) a "History of the Israelites before Jesus," (12 vols., 1776–88,) and other works. He-sў'ch'l-us, [Gr. Ἡσύχιος,] the author of a valuable Greek Lexicon, (first printed by Aldus in 1514,) which explains technical terms, unusual words found in the works of poets, orators, and physicians, terms used in sacrifices, divinations, and such as depart from ordinary usage. It is supposed that the existing text is an abridgment or imperfect copy of the original. The time in which Hesychius lived is not known; but it was probably since the Christian era, as numerous scriptural glosses or phrases are found in his work.

See PEARSON, "Adversaria Hesychiana," 2 vols., 1844; ERSCH und GRUBER, "Allgemeine Encyklopaedie."

Hesychius OF MILETUS, [Lat. HESYCH'IUS MILE'SIUS,] surnamed THE ILLUSTRIOUS, lived in the sixth century. He wrote (in Greek) a universal history from Belus to his own times, (about 520 A.D.,) of which some fragments only are now extant. He left also an abridgment of the "Lives of the Philosophers," derived chiefly from Diogenes Laertius. This was published by J. C. Orelli, Leipsic, 1820.

He-ve'lĭ-us, [Ger. pron. hȧ-vā'le-ŭs,] (Joannes or John Hevel—hā'vẹl, written also Hovel and Hewelcke,) an eminent astronomer, born at Dantzic in 1611, was a pupil of Kruger. His parents were noble and wealthy. After studying at Leyden and making the tour of Europe, he devoted his uninterrupted attention to astronomy for nearly fifty years. In 1641 he built an observatory at his own residence, which he furnished with telescopes and other instruments made by his own hands. In 1647 he published "Selenographia," a description of the moon, with plates, followed by letters on the "Libration of the Moon," and on Eclipses, (1654.) His treatise on the phases of Saturn appeared in 1656, and his "Observations on the Transit of Mercury" in 1661. He wrote, also, "Cometographia," a general description of comets, (1668.) Hevelius was chosen a Fellow of the Royal Society of London in 1664. He was repeatedly elected consul and judge by his fellow-citizens, by whom he was highly esteemed. In 1673 he published the first part of his "Machina Cœlestis," a description of his observatory, instruments, and modus operandi, the second part of which appeared in 1679. In the latter year a fire consumed his observatory, library, and nearly all the copies of the book just named. After his death his widow published "Harbinger of Astronomy," ("Prodromus Astronomiæ,") and "Firmamentum Sobieskanum," dedicated to John Sobieski, King of Poland. In skill, accuracy, and diligence in observation, he was an astronomer of a very high, if not of the first, order; but his prejudice against the use of fine instruments in observing rendered many of his tables worthless. Died January 28, 1687.

Heyne, hī′nĕh, [Lat. HEY′NIUS,] (CHRISTIAN GOTTLOB,) an illustrious German scholar and critic, was born at Chemnitz, in Saxony, in 1729. Owing to the poverty of his family, he enjoyed few advantages of education; but, having by nature an irrepressible desire for knowledge, he improved to the utmost the opportunities which he possessed, so that in 1763 he succeeded Gesner as professor of eloquence at Göttingen. He was soon after made chief librarian of the university. His lectures, illustrating the history and mythology of the ancients in the most attractive manner, gained him a high reputation, which was increased by his numerous and excellent writings. Among the most important of these are editions of Tibullus, (1755,) Virgil, Epictetus, (1756,) Pindar, etc., with commentaries, and "Opuscula Academica," (6 vols., 1785–1812.) Died at Göttingen in July, 1812.

"Nothing," says Sir William Hamilton, "has contributed so decisively to maintain and promote the study of classical literature, as the combination which Heyne has effected of philosophy with erudition, both in his commentaries on the ancient authors and in those works in which he has illustrated various points of antiquity." Hez-e-ki'ah, [Heb. חזקיהו or חזקיה; Fr. Ezéchias, à'zà'ke'âs',] King of Judah, a son of Ahaz, was born about 750 B.C., and began to reign in 726. He took prompt measures to restore the true religion, which had been forsaken by his father. He broke the images or statues, and the brazen serpent of Moses, to which the people had burnt incense. He rebelled against the King of Assyria, to whom his father had paid tribute. In the fourteenth year of his reign, Sennacherib, King of Assyria, invaded Judah and besieged the capital. In this crisis the divine favour was invoked by the king and Isaiah, the latter of whom prophesied the safety of Zion and the defeat of her proud invader. (Isaiah, chap. xxxvii.) The angel of the Lord smote the Assyrians, so that 185,000 died in one night. Hezekiah died after a reign of twenty-nine years.

His principal works are "Rational Psychology," (1848,) "Empirical Psychology," (1854,) and "Rational Cosmology," (1858.) Died in 1888.

Hicks, (Elias,) a noted preacher of the Society of Friends, or Quakers, was born in Hempstead, Queen's county, Long Island, in 1748. He began to speak in public as a minister of the gospel in 1775. He was early convinced of the iniquity of slavery, and felt it to be his duty to abstain, as far as practicable, from all participation in the products of slave labour,—a duty which he appears to have scrupulously observed throughout the remainder of his life. For many years he was a zealous and approved minister in the Society of which he was a member; but early in the present century he began to promulgate religious views widely different from those held by a large majority of the Quakers. He advocated the most radical Unitarian doctrines, and asserted that Christ came as a Saviour to the Israelites only, his special mission being limited to that nation. He even went so far as to express the opinion that the Scriptures had been "the cause of fourfold more harm than good to Christendom since the apostles' days." In consequence of the expression of these and similar views, he was severely censured and denounced by many of those who were anxious to maintain unchanged the doctrines of the early Quakers. The result was a schism in the Society The elders of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting had taken a leading part in the opposition to Elias Hicks; and it was in that Yearly Meeting (in April, 1827) that the first separation took place, which was followed, in 1828, by divisions in the Yearly Meetings of New York, Baltimore, Ohio, and Indiana. The two parties were respectively known as the "Orthodox" and the "Hicksites." In the Philadelphia and Ohio Yearly Meetings the two sections were nearly equal; but those called "Hicksites" were greatly in the majority in the Yearly Meetings of New York and Baltimore, while in Indiana the "Orthodox" were numerically much superior to the other party.

It is proper to observe that among those who most admired the bold and stirring eloquence of Hicks there were probably but few, comparatively speaking, who fully endorsed his extreme views; yet, regarding him as the representative of liberal and progressive ideas, they warmly espoused his cause. On the other hand, many who strongly disapproved—and under other circumstances would perhaps have severely condemned—his innovating doctrines, yet believing that he had been unfairly and harshly dealt with by the "Orthodox" elders, made common cause with what they considered the persecuted party, and contributed greatly to swell the number of his adherents. It may be proper to add that the anti-orthodox division of the Society do not acknowledge the name of "Hicksites," alleging, not without reason, that as a large majority of their members had espoused the cause of Hicks in the interest of religious liberty, and not because they approved of his peculiar views, it is unjust to apply to them as a religious society a name which would naturally give the impression that they were, strictly speaking, his followers, and that they accepted, if not all, at least the greater part, of his religious teachings. They claim, on the contrary, to be the followers of no man; and although they accept the doctrine of the inward light, and many other of the views of the early Friends, it is not because of the authority of Fox, Penn, or Barclay, but simply because those views commend themselves to that divinely given or intuitive perception of right which, as they maintain, has been bestowed in a measure upon every human being. Elias Hicks died on the 27th of February, 1830, having maintained through life a blameless and exemplary moral character.

Hicks, (Francis,) a Greek scholar, born in Worcestershire, England, in 1566. He produced a translation of Lucian, (1634.) Died in 1630.

Hicks, (Thomas,) an American painter, born at Newtown, Bucks county, Pennsylvania, in 1823. He went to Europe in 1845, and passed several years at Rome, where he copied the works of old masters and painted portraits. He afterwards resided for many years in the city of New York. Died October 8, 1890.

Hicks or Hickes, (William,) was an English captain in the time of Charles I., and author of the first Jest-Book in the English language, published at Oxford. (1669.)

Hidalgo, (José Garcia.) See Garzia.

Hidalgo y Costilla, e-dâl'go e kos-tēl'yā, (Don Miguel,) a Spanish priest, who was curate of Dolores, in Mexico. He acquired great influence among the natives, of whom he became the leader in the revolution of 1810. After losing several battles, he was taken by the Spaniards and executed in 1811.

Hiel, heel, (Emanuel,) a Belgian lyric poet, born at Dendermonde, May 30, 1834. He ranks among the first in the new school of Flemish authors. Several of his published works are translations from the German.

Hi-emp'sal, a Numidian prince, a son of Micipsa, was murdered by Jugurtha, according to Sallust.

Hien-Fung, he-ĕn' fŭng, Emperor of China, born about 1830, was a younger son of Taoo-Kooang. He ascended the throne in 1850, and appointed ministers who wished to maintain an exclusive policy towards foreigners. In the same year began a great insurrection, raised and directed by Tien-Te or Tai-Ping-Wang. The insurgents were generally victorious, and captured Nankin in 1853. (See TAI-PING-WANG.) A war broke out between the Chinese and the British, who entered Pekin in triumph in 1860. Died in 1861.

Hiero. See HIERON.

Hi-ĕr'o-clēs, [Gr. Ἱεροκλῆς,] an eminent Platonic philosopher, who was the head of a flourishing school in Alexandria in the fifth century. He is the author of a "Commentary on the Golden Verses of Pythagoras," which has been preserved entire, and of a "Treatise on Providence (or Foreknowledge) and Fate," of which some fragments remain. The former is written in Greek, and is admired for the beauty of the thoughts and of the style.

See ANDRÉ DACIER, "Vie de Hiéroclès," 1706.

Hierocles, the author of a work on veterinary medicine, addressed to Cassianus Bassus, lived in the third or fourth century of our era.

Hierocles, a grammarian, who is supposed to have lived in the sixth century, wrote, in Greek, a "Hand-Book for Travellers," (Συνέκδημος,) which contains descriptions of the towns and provinces of the Eastern empire.

There was also a Stoic philosopher named HIEROCLES, of whom we have little information. He is supposed to have lived in the second century. Another HIEROCLES compiled or wrote a collection of anecdotes and ridiculous sayings of pedants, students, etc., with the Latin title of "Facetiæ Hieroclis."

Hierocles OF ALABANDA, a Greek rhetorician, lived about 100 B.C. He composed orations in the style which Cicero calls the "Asiatic."

Hierocles OF BITHYNIA was the principal author of the persecution of the Christians in the reign of Diocletian, (about 300 A.D.) He wrote two books against Christianity, entitled "Sincere Discourses to the Christians," (Λόγοι φιλαλήθεις,) in which he maintains that the Scripture is full of contradictions. He was prefect of Bithynia and of Alexandria.

Hi'ẹ-ron or Hī'ẹ-ro [Gr. Ἱέρων] I., King of Syracuse, succeeded his brother Gelon in 478 B.C. The first part of his reign was tyrannical. He expelled the citizens of Naxos and Catana, and colonized those towns with his own subjects. He is applauded for his patronage of literature and his appreciation of genius. His court was the resort of the most eminent poets and sages of his time, among whom were Pindar, Æschylus, Simonides, and Epicharmus. Pindar wrote several odes on the occasion of Hieron's victories at the Olympic games, and Simonides enjoyed his friendship and bounty. Died in 467 B.C.

See XENOPHON, "Hieron."

Hieron (or Hiero) II., King of Syracuse, was the son of Hierocles, a private citizen. Having served in the army of Pyrrhus, who left Sicily in a state of anarchy, Hieron was chosen general by the soldiers in 275 B.C., and recognised as king about 270. At the beginning of the first Punic war he took side with the Carthaginians, and was defeated by the Romans about 264 B.C. He then made peace with the victors by the payment of tribute, and was ever after a faithful ally of Rome. Under his wise rule the kingdom for many years enjoyed peace and prosperity. Died in 216 B.C. Archimedes lived in Syracuse in this reign, and exercised his mechanical genius in constructing machines and ships of great size.

Hī'ẹ-ron, (SAMUEL,) an English Puritan, born at Epping in 1572, was rector of Modbury, and published sermons and other works on theology. Died in 1617.

Hiéronyme. See HIERONYMUS.

Hi-e-ron'ў-mus, [Gr. Ἱερώνυμος; Fr. HIÉRONYME, ē'à'ro'nèm',] King of Syracuse, was the grandson of Hieron II., whom he succeeded in 216 B.C., at the age of fifteen. He broke the alliance with the Romans, who had recently been defeated at Cannæ, and formed a league with the Carthaginians. He was on the point of taking an active part in the war, when he was killed by his own subjects about a year after his accession. He left no issue; and the Syracusans thenceforth dispensed with royalty.

Hieronymus was the Latin name of Saint Jerome, one of the Fathers of the Church.

Hieronymus OF CARDIA, [Fr. HIÉRONYME, ē'à'ro'nèm', (or JÉRÔME, zhà'rom',) DE CARDIE, dẹh kȧr'de',] a Greek historian, who flourished about 300 B.C. He entered the service of Eumenes, who employed him on a mission to Antipater in 320. He was afterwards an adherent of Demetrius, who appointed him Governor of Bœotia in 292 B.C. He wrote historical memoirs of the successors of Alexander the Great,—a work which is often cited by the ancients, but has not come down to us.

See VOSSIUS, "De Historicis Græcis;" SEVIN, "Recherches sur la Vie et les Ouvrages de Jérôme de Cardie."

Hieronymus OF RHODES, a Greek philosopher, and disciple of Aristotle, lived about 300 B.C.

Hif'fẹr-nan, (PAUL,) born in the county of Dublin, Ireland, in 1719, lived many years in London as a literary hack, and wrote several mediocre dramas, etc. His habits were eccentric. Died in 1777.

Hig'bee, (ELNATHAN ELISHA,) D.D., an American educator, born in Saint George, Vermont, March 27, 1830. He graduated at the University of Vermont in 1849. Having entered the ministry of the German Reformed Church, he was in 1864 appointed professor in the theological seminary at Mercersburg, Pennsylvania. In 1871 he was made president of Mercersburg College, and in 1881 superintendent of public instruction for Pennsylvania. Died December 13, 1889.

Hig'dẹn, (RANULPH or RALPH,) an English monk, connected with a Benedictine monastery at Chester wrote "Polychronicon," a Latin chronicle. He died, at a great age, about 1370.

Hig'ĝins, (GODFREY,) an English antiquary, born in Yorkshire in 1771, wrote "The Celtic Druids," and other works. Died in 1833.

Higgins or Higins, (JOHN,) an English writer, born about 1544, was a clergyman and school-teacher. He published the "Flosculi" of Terence, a popular school-book, and contributed to the "Mirror for Magistrates," of which he published a new edition.

Higgins, (MATTHEW JAMES,) an English journalist, born about 1810, wrote under the assumed name of JACOB OMNIUM. He contributed many articles to the London "Times," the "Pall Mall Gazette," and other journals. His writings were mostly devoted to the exposure of abuses in the social and military systems of England. Died in 1868.

Hig'ĝin-sọn, (FRANCIS,) a distinguished divine, born in England in 1588. He was educated at Cambridge University, and appointed rector of a church in Leicester, in which position he laboured with great zeal and success until removed for nonconformity. He came to Massachusetts in 1629, and the next month was ordained with Mr. Skelton, the first minister of Salem. Died in 1630. He was the author of "New England's Plantation," (1630.)

Higginson, (JOHN,) born in England in 1616, accompanied his father Francis to Massachusetts in 1629. He was minister of the church at Salem from 1660 until his death in 1708, and published sermons and other theological works. He was regarded as the most able and eloquent American author of his time. Among his works is his "Attestation to Cotton Mather's Magnalia."

Higginson, (THOMAS WENTWORTH,) an American writer, born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, December 22, 1823. He graduated at Harvard College in 1841, and at the Cambridge Divinity School, and was minister of Unitarian churches in Newburyport and Worcester, Massachusetts. He was a very active abolitionist. In 1856 he went to Kansas and served against the pro-slavery forces, having the rank of a brigadier-general in the Free-State troops. He served in the civil war, 1862–64, attaining the rank of colonel of coloured troops in South Carolina, and leaving the service only when disabled by a wound. He afterwards gave his time chiefly to literature, and to educational and other reforms. Among his principal works are "Out-Door Papers," (1863,) "Malbone," a romance, (1869,) "Army Life in a Black Regiment," (1870,) "Atlantic Essays," (1871,) "Oldport Days," (1873,) "Young Folks' History of the United States," (1875,) "Memoir of Margaret Fuller Ossoli," (1884,) "Larger History of the United States," (1884,) etc. He also edited a translation of Epictetus, (1865,) "Harvard Memorial Biographies," (1866,) and "Brief Biographies of English Statesmen," (1875.)

Hig'gons, (Sir THOMAS,) was born in Shropshire, England, in 1624. He married the notorious Countess of Essex, (see CARR, ROBERT,) at whose funeral in 1656 he pronounced an oration, which was printed. He was sent as ambassador to Vienna in 1673. Died in 1691. His son, BEVIL, born in 1670, wrote, besides several poems, a "Short View of English History," (1723.) He was a zealous Jacobite, and went into exile with James II. Died in France in 1735.

Hīgh'more, (JOSEPH,) an English portrait-painter, born in London in 1692, was a pupil of Kneller. He executed portraits of the Knights of the Bath, and was employed by George I. to paint some members of the royal family. In 1742 he painted the portraits of the Prince and Princess of Wales. He wrote a treatise on Perspective. Died in 1780.

Highmore, (NATHANIEL,) an eminent English physician, born at Fordingbridge in 1613, practised with success at Sherborne. He wrote able treatises on anatomy. Died in 1684.

Hilaire. See HILARY.

Hi-lā'rĭ-on, SAINT, a noted ascetic or hermit of Palestine, and pioneer of monastic life, was born at Tabatha, near Gaza, about 292 A.D. At an early age he went to Alexandria as a student, and was converted to Christianity. Returning to Palestine, he retired from the world, passed many years in the desert, and gained a wide reputation by his austerities. Many monasteries were founded by him or by the influence of his example. Died about 372.

See SAINT JEROME, "Vita Hilarioni;" BAILLET, "Vies des Saints."

Hilarius. See HILARY.

Hi-lā'rĭ-us, surnamed DIAC'ONUS, a native of Sardinia, lived about 350 A.D., and became a deacon of the church in Rome. He was an adversary of Arianism.

Hĭl'ą-rў, [Lat. HILA'RIUS; Fr. HILAIRE, ē'lâr',] a native of Sardinia, was chosen Bishop or Pope of Rome in 461 A.D., as successor to Leo I. In 449 he had officiated as legate at the Council of Ephesus, where he zealously opposed the Eutychians. The events of his pontificate were unimportant. It appears that he claimed the preeminence of the see of Rome. He died in 467, and was succeeded by Simplicius.

Hilary or Hilarius, [Fr. HILAIRE, ē'lâr',] SAINT, an orthodox theologian, was born at Poitiers, (Pictavi,) in Gaul, of which place he became bishop about 350 A.D. He took a prominent part in defence of Athanasius against the Arians, for which he was banished to Phrygia in 356. In 359, at the Council of Seleucia, he defended the doctrine of the Trinity, and afterwards published a violent invective against the Arian emperor Constantius, whom he denounced as Antichrist. Having returned to Italy and Gaul, he laboured zealously to purge the churches of heresy. He wrote a "Treatise on Synods," a "Commentary on Saint Matthew," and a few other works. Died in 367 A.D.

See CAVE, "Scriptores Ecclesiastici;" TILLEMONT, "Mémoires."

Hilary or Hilarius, SAINT, was born about 400 A.D., probably in Gaul or Belgium. He became Bishop of Arles in 429, and was highly esteemed for piety and learning. His contest with Leo, Bishop of Rome, forms an important epoch in the history of the Gallic Church. Celidonius, a bishop, having been deposed by a council at which Hilarius presided, appealed to Leo, who reinstated him, and, supported by an edict of the emperor Valentinian III., deprived Hilarius of his bishopric because the latter refused to own the supremacy of Rome. This was one of the first efforts made to build up the papal power. Died in 449. His "Eulogy on Honoratus" is much admired.

See BELLARMIN, "De Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis;" TILLEMONT, "Mémoires;" "Gallia Christiana."

Hĭl'dą, SAINT, a grand-niece of Edwin, King of Northumbria, was converted to Christianity in her childhood, became abbess of the convent of Heorthen (afterwards Whitby) about 660, and died in 680 A.D.

Hĭl'dę-bâld, [Lat. HILDEBAL'DUS,] King of the Ostrogoths in Lombardy. After Belisarius had conquered the Ostrogoths, they proclaimed Hildebald their king at Pavía in 540 A.D. The next year he gained a victory over the Romans, soon after which he was assassinated by one of his guards.

See JORNANDES, "De Regnorum Successione;" GIBBON, "History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire."

Hĭl'de-bęrt, [Lat. HILDEBER'TUS,] a French prelate and poet, born at Lavardin in 1057, became Archbishop of Tours in 1125. He was eminent for his piety and learning, and was one of the best writers of his time. His works are written in Latin, and consist of epistles, sermons, and poems. Died in 1134.

See "Gallia Christiana;" "Vita Hildeberti," prefixed to his Works, published by BEAUGENDRE in 1708.

Hildebrand, (HANS OLOF HILDEBRAND,) a son of Bror Emil Hildebrand, was born at Stockholm, April 5, 1842. Among his many works are a "History of Sweden" and "Sweden in the Middle Ages." Died in 1890.

Hildebrandt, hĭl'dęh-brânt', (EDUARD,) a German painter, born at Dantzic in 1817, studied in Berlin and Paris, and travelled in almost all parts of the world. He painted a vast number of pictures, of which the best are often remarkable for their masterly display of coloration. Died at Berlin, October 25, 1868.

Hildebrandt, hĭl'dęh-brânt', (FERDINAND THEODOR,) a German historical painter, and one of the most eminent masters of the Dusseldorf school, was born at Stettin in 1804. He studied under W. Schadow at Berlin, and settled at Dusseldorf. Among his works are "King Lear and Cordelia," (1826,) "Tancred and Clorinda," (1828,) and "Othello relating his Adventures to Desdemona," (1848.) Died September 29, 1874.

Hildebrandt, (GEORG FRIEDRICH,) a German physician and naturalist, born at Hanover in 1764, wrote, besides other works, a "Manual of Human Anatomy," (4 vols., 1789–92.) Died in 1816.

Hĭl'dę-gard' or Hildegarde, SAINT, a German nun, born in 1098, became abbess of Saint Rupert's Mount, near Bingen, on the Rhine. Died in 1180.

See J. C. DAHL, "Die heilige Hildegardis; historische Abhandlung," 1832.

Hildenbrand, von, fon hĭl'dęn-brânt', (VALENTIN JOHANN,) a German medical writer, born in Vienna in 1763; died in 1818.

Hĭl'dęrs-ham, (ARTHUR,) an English Puritan divine, born in Cambridgeshire in 1563. He held the living of Ashby-de-la-Zouch from 1593 until his death. He was a grand-nephew of Cardinal Pole, and was related to the royal family. He wrote various theological works, and was esteemed a shining light among the Puritans. Died in 1631.

Hĭl'dęs-ley, (MARK,) an English theologian, born in Kent in 1698. He became Bishop of Sodor and Man in 1755, and caused the Bible to be translated into the Manx language. Died in 1772.

See WEEDON BUTLER, "Memoirs of M. Hildesley," 1799.

Hĭl'dręth, (RICHARD,) an American journalist and historian, was born in Deerfield, Massachusetts, June 28, 1807. He graduated at Harvard in 1826, and, while studying law, contributed numerous articles to magazines. Admitted to the bar in Boston in 1830, he abandoned the legal profession at the expiration of two years, to accept the position of associate editor of the "Boston Atlas," which soon became one of the ablest Whig journals in New England. His health having failed, he spent the year 1835 in Florida, and while there wrote "Archy Moore," an anti-slavery novel. It was republished and favourably reviewed in England, and an enlarged edition, under the title of "The White Slave," was issued in the United States in 1852. In 1837 he furnished to the columns of the "Atlas" a series of articles which contributed powerfully towards defeating schemes then on foot for the annexation of Texas. He took a conspicuous part in the Presidential canvass which resulted in the nomination and election of General Harrison. He also gave to the public during this period his "Despotism in America," an able review of the social, political, and economical aspects of slavery in the United States, to which he added in 1854 a chapter on the "Legal Basis of Slavery." His health having again failed, he embarked in 1840 for British Guiana, and, during a residence of three years at Georgetown, the capital, wrote his "Theory of Morals," published in 1844, and "Theory of Politics, or an Inquiry into the Foundation of Governments and the Causes and Progress of Political Revolutions," issued in 1853. Mr. Hildreth is best known, however, by his "History of the United States of America," from the discovery of the continent to the close of the Sixteenth Congress in 1820, (6 vols. 8vo, 1849–52.) It was projected while the author was a student at Harvard. The work has been variously criticised; but all agree in classing it among the standard histories of our country. Died at Florence in July, 1865.

See DUYCKINCK, "Cyclopædia of American Literature," vol. ii.; CLEVELAND, "Compendium of American Literature."

Hildreth, (SAMUEL PRESCOTT,) M.D., an American physician, born in Massachusetts in 1783. He settled in Ohio in 1806. His principal works are a "Pioneer History of the Ohio Valley," (1848,) and "Biographical and Historical Memoirs of the Early Settlers of Ohio," (1852.) Died at Marietta, Ohio, in 1863.

Hilferding, hil'fĕr-ding', (ALEXANDER FEODOROVITCH,) a Russian author, of German descent, born at Moscow in 1831. Among his numerous works are a "History of the Serbs and Bulgarians," "History of the Baltic Slavs," and "Travels in Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Old Servia." He also wrote much on Slavic philology. Died July 2, 1872.

Hil'gard, (EUGENE WOLDEMAR,) Ph.D., a German-American scientist, a brother of J. E. Hilgard, was born at Zweibrücken, January 5, 1833. In 1835 he went with his father to Belleville, Illinois. He was educated at Freiberg, Zurich, and Heidelberg, where he graduated in 1853, was State geologist of Mississippi, 1857–73, professor of chemistry in the University of Mississippi, 1866–73, professor of geology in the University of Michigan, 1873–75, and in 1875 became professor of agriculture in the University of California. He has published many valuable reports and scientific papers.

Hill, (NATHANIEL P.,) an American Senator, born in Montgomery, New York, February 18, 1832. He graduated in 1857 at Brown University, where he was professor of applied chemistry, 1860–64. He studied metallurgy in Europe, 1865–66, and in 1867 removed to Denver, Colorado, as manager of a smelting company. From 1879 to 1885 he was United States Senator from Colorado.

Hill, (Sir RICHARD,) born in 1733, a brother of Rowland, was member of Parliament for Salop, and sometimes preached in the Calvinistic Methodist chapels. He wrote a few religious works. Died in 1808.

Hill, (ROBERT,) a self-taught English linguist, born at Miswell in 1699, was a tailor by trade. He was master of several ancient languages, and wrote "Criticisms on Job," and a few other works. Died in 1777.

See "Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties," vol. i., 1839.

Hill, (Rev. ROWLAND,) a popular preacher and disciple of Whitefield, was born at Hawkstone, England, in 1744. He was the son of Sir Rowland Hill, and uncle of General Lord Hill. After leaving college he was ordained a deacon of the Anglican Church, but soon became a zealous and eloquent preacher among the Calvinistic Methodists. Addressing the people in the streets, the open air, or wherever he could gain audience, he made many converts in various parts of the kingdom. In 1783 he built Surrey Chapel, London, in which he preached about fifty winters. He was the author of "Village Dialogues," and other works. Southey, in reference to a particular occasion, says, "His manner was animated and striking, sometimes dignified and impressive. The purport of his sermon was good,—nothing fanatical, nothing enthusiastic." Died in 1833.

See J. SHERMAN, "Memorial of the late Rev. R. Hill, chiefly consisting of Anecdotes," etc., London, 1851; E. SIDNEY, "Life of the Rev. Rowland Hill," 1834; WILLIAM JONES, "Memoirs of the Life of Rev. Rowland Hill."

Hill, (ROWLAND,) VISCOUNT, an English general, born at Prees, Shropshire, in 1772, was the second son of Sir John Hill, and nephew of the Rev. Rowland Hill. He entered the army as ensign in 1790, and obtained the rank of colonel in 1800. In 1806 he was made a major-general and appointed on the staff. In 1808 he served in Portugal, under Sir Arthur Wellesley and Sir John Moore, until the battle of Corunna. Promoted to the rank of lieutenant-general in 1809, he was employed several years in the Peninsular war, and gained a high reputation in his profession. In 1814 he was raised to the peerage, as Baron of Almarez and Hawkstone. He took part in the battle of Waterloo in 1815, and afterwards was second in command of the army of occupation in France. Lord Hill was commander-in-chief of the army from 1828 until 1842, when he resigned and was created a viscount. He died in 1842, and left the title to his nephew, Sir Rowland Hill.

See E. SIDNEY, "Life of Viscount Hill," 1850; NAPIER, "History of the Peninsular War."

Hill, (Sir ROWLAND,) an Englishman, known as the author of the cheap postage system, was born at Kidderminster in 1795. In 1837 he wrote a pamphlet on "Post-Office Reform, its Importance and Practicability." Through his persistent efforts, a bill was passed in the session of 1839–40 to reduce the rate of postage and render it uniform. The postage has since been further reduced, and letters are now carried for one penny each to any part of the United Kingdom. The people expressed their gratitude for this benefit by a present of £13,000 raised by subscription. He was appointed secretary to the postmaster-general in 1846, and sole secretary to the post-office in 1854. In 1864, his health having failed, he retired from office, but the treasury awarded him for life his salary of £2000 per annum, and Parliament a grant of £20,000. Died August 27, 1879.

Hill, (THOMAS,) a mathematician and Unitarian minister, born at New Brunswick, New Jersey, in 1818, graduated at Harvard in 1843. He published, besides other works, "Geometry and Faith," and contributed many articles to the "North American Review" and the "Atlantic Monthly." In 1859 he succeeded Horace Mann as president of Antioch College, Ohio. He was president of Harvard University from 1862 to 1868. Died November 21, 1891.

Hill, (THOMAS,) an Anglo-American painter, born in England in 1829. When he was twelve years old he was brought to the United States. He became a decorator, first in Boston and then in Philadelphia, but in 1861 removed to San Francisco. Among his best pictures are "White Mountain Notch," "The Yosemite Valley," "The Great Cañon," etc.

Hill, (THOMAS FORD,) an English antiquary and philologist, published "Ancient Erse Poems." Died in 1795.

Hill, (WILLIAM,) D.D., an American divine, born in Cumberland county, Virginia, in 1769. He graduated at Hampden-Sidney College in 1788. From 1800 to 1834 he was pastor of the Presbyterian church in Winchester, where he died in 1852.

Hil'lard, (GEORGE STILLMAN,) an eminent American writer, lawyer, and orator, born in Machias, Maine, in 1808. While pursuing his collegiate course at Harvard, (where he graduated in 1828,) he is said to have been especially distinguished in declamation and English composition. He was afterwards for some time associated with George Bancroft in his Round Hill Seminary at Northampton, Massachusetts, and in 1833 was admitted to the bar in Boston. Besides attending to an extensive professional business, he afterwards twice visited Europe, and was a member of both branches of the Massachusetts legislature. He was author of a great number of orations, lectures before the Lowell Institute, and contributions to the "Christian Examiner," "North American Review," etc. In 1852 he was selected by the authorities of Boston to deliver the eulogy on the character of Daniel Webster. The next year appeared his "Six Months in Italy," (in 2 vols. 12mo,) which had reached the fifth edition in 1855. "Mr. Hillard's work," says a critic in the "Quarterly Review" for April, 1858, "is that of a scholar and a gentleman, a man of sense as well as of taste and feeling. His style is pointed and full of happy expressions and striking images." Among other literary labours, Mr. Hillard edited the Poetical Works of Spenser, (in 5 vols. 8vo.) He was for some time associate editor of the "Jurist," and was for several years one of the principal editors of the "Boston Courier." He contributed several important articles to the "New American Cyclopædia," including those on Alexander and Edward Everett and Rufus Choate. He died in 1879.

Hillebrand, hil'leh-brânt', (JOSEPH,) a German philosophical writer, born near Hildesheim in 1788. He published, among other works, "The Philosophy of the Spirit," (2 vols., 1835,) and "The German National Literature since the Beginning of the Eighteenth Century," (2 vols., 1845.) Died January 25, 1871.

Hillebrand, (KARL,) a distinguished German historian, a son of the preceding, was born at Giessen, September 17, 1829. Banished from Germany for political causes, he became in 1863 a professor at Douai. His "History of France since 1830," "France and the French," and a treatise on educational reform, were published before his removal, in 1870, to Florence, where he became the founder and librarian of the Circolo Filologico. He also published a volume on "England and the English," and a "History of German Thought."

Most of his writings are in German. Died at Florence, October 18, 1884.

Hil'lel, a famous Jewish rabbi, born at Babylon about 110 B.C., was descended from King David. He went to Jerusalem at the age of forty, acquired a thorough knowledge of the law, and was chosen president of the Sanhedrim about 30 B.C. The origin of the Talmud or Mishna is ascribed to Hillel, who was the leader of a numerous school or party. He died at the age of one hundred and twenty years.

Hillel, a noted rabbi, supposed to have lived about 300 A.D., was a descendant of the preceding. He reformed the Jewish calendar by means of a cycle of nineteen years.

Hiller, hil'lẹr, (FERDINAND,) a celebrated German composer, born of Jewish parents at Frankfort, October 24, 1811. He published an oratorio of the "Destruction of Jerusalem," (1840,) "The Musical Life of our Times," (1868,) and Lives of Beethoven and Mendelssohn. Died at Cologne, May 11, 1885.

Hil'ler, (JOHANN ADAM,) whose real name was HÜLLER, a Prussian musician and composer, born at Wendisch-Ossig, near Görlitz, in 1728. His best-known compositions are his "Singspiele," of which one at least, "Die Jagd," still keeps the stage. Died in 1804.

Hiller, (MATTHÄUS,) a German Orientalist, born at Stuttgart in 1646, was professor of Oriental languages and theology at Tübingen. He wrote a "Latin Hebrew Lexicon," (1685.) Died in 1725.

Hiller, (PHILIPP FRIEDRICH,) one of the best of the South-German religious poets, was born at Mühlhausen, in Würtemberg, January 6, 1699. He became a Protestant pastor, and died at Steinheim, April 24, 1769.

Hiller, von, fon hil'lẹr, (JOHANN,) BARON, an Austrian general, born at Neustadt, near Vienna, in 1754. In 1809 he obtained command of the sixth corps of the army of the archduke Charles. Although he was defeated by Napoleon at Landshut in April, he contributed greatly to the success of the Austrians at Aspern in the next month. Died in 1819.

Hilton, (WILLIAM,) a successful English historical painter, born at Lincoln in 1786. About 1800 he became a student in the Royal Academy, and in 1804 exhibited his "Hector reinspired by Apollo." In 1819 or 1820 he was elected a member of the Academy, and in 1825 succeeded Fuseli as keeper of that institution. He attained a high rank among the English artists of his time. Among his best works are "Nature blowing Bubbles," and "The Graces teaching Cupid to play on the Lyre." Died in 1839.

See PILKINGTON'S "Dictionary of Painters."

Hi-me'rĭ-us, [Ἱμέριος,] an eminent Greek sophist of Prusa, Bithynia. He became master of a celebrated school in Athens, and afterwards secretary of the emperor Julian at Antioch about 362 A.D. He composed many orations, of which about twenty are extant. His style is rather bombastic. Among his pupils were Gregory Nazianzen and Saint Basil. He was always a pagan, but moderate or friendly to the Christians.

Hĭ-mil'co or Hi-mil'cọn, a Carthaginian navigator, the date of whose adventures is unknown. Pliny states that he sailed northward from Gades on a voyage of discovery about the time that Hanno explored the western coast of Africa. R. Festus Avienus quotes him as his authority for an account of the islands of the Hiberni and Albioni.

Himilco or Himilcon, an able Carthaginian general, who was joined with Hannibal in the command of a large army in the war against Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse. He took Agrigentum after a long siege, during which the death of Hannibal left him sole commander, (406 B.C.) He defeated Dionysius about 405, soon after which peace was concluded. The war having been renewed in 397 B.C., Himilco raised an army of 100,000 men, with which he marched victoriously to the gates of Syracuse. While he was besieging this city, his army was wasted by pestilence and defeated by the Syracusans. He escaped to Carthage and killed himself.

See DIODORUS SICULUS, books xiii., xiv., and xx.

Himilco or Himilcon was commander of the fleet of Carthage, on the coast of Sicily, in 214 B.C., while Marcellus commanded the Romans in that island. He landed an army in 213, gained some advantages, and, having failed in an attempt to relieve Syracuse, died of pestilence in 212 B.C.

Himly, him'lee, (KARL GUSTAV,) a German physician, born at Brunswick in 1772, was professor of medicine at Göttingen. He was distinguished for his skilful treatment of diseases of the eyes, on which he published a valuable work. Died in 1837.

Himmel, him'mẹl, (FRIEDRICH HEINRICH,) a German composer, born in the duchy of Brandenburg in 1765, was appointed chapel-master at Berlin about 1796. Among his best works are the operas of "Fanchon" and "The Sylphs." Died in 1814.

Hip-par'chus, [Gr. Ἵππαρχος; Fr. HIPPARQUE, e'pȧrk',] son of Pisistratus, an Athenian, who, in partnership with his brother Hippias, obtained the chief power in the state in 527 B.C. He was assassinated by Harmodius and Aristogiton in 514. Hippias survived; but, having rendered himself unpopular by cruelty and suspicious habits, (although it is said he was previously mild and affable,) he was expelled from Athens in 511. He afterwards passed many years at the court of the Persian king Darius, served as guide to the Persian army which invaded Greece, and was at the battle of Marathon, where, according to some writers, he was killed, 490 B.C.

See HERODOTUS, books ii., v., vi., and vii.; THIRLWALL, "History of Greece."

Hipparchus, [Gr. Ἵππαρχος; Fr. HIPPARQUE; It. IPPARCO, ẹp-pȧr'ko,] the founder of the science of astronomy, and the greatest astronomer of antiquity, was a native of Nicæa, in Bithynia. He was of Greek extraction, and flourished about 150 B.C. Many of his observations were made at Rhodes. His writings are all lost, except a "Commentary on Aratus," which is the least important; but the knowledge of his discoveries has been preserved by Ptolemy in his "Syntaxis." The first who made systematic observations, he was also the first who discovered that fundamental fact in astronomy,—the precession of the equinoxes. A discovery so important would have sufficed to immortalize him; but he also greatly enriched the science of mathematics, and was the first who understood trigonometry, both plane and spherical. He invented the planisphere and the stereographic projection, and gave rules for the calculation of eclipses, by means of which he determined the longitude. According to Pliny, who calls him the confidant and interpreter of nature, Hipparchus, having perceived a new star that suddenly appeared in his time, was stimulated by it to form his Catalogue of one thousand and eighty stars, which is preserved in the "Almagest" of Ptolemy. In this operation he used the astrolabe, which was probably invented by him. He originated a more complete system of geography, and the mode of determining the position of towns by circles drawn on the earth corresponding to those of the celestial sphere. Among his lost works were "On the Magnitudes and Distances of the Sun and Moon," "The Movement of the Moon in Latitude," and "On the Retrogradation of the Equinoctial and Solstitial Points."

Hipparchus, an Athenian comic poet, who lived probably about 300 B.C.

Hipparque. See HIPPARCHUS.

Hip'pa-sus, [Gr. Ἵππασος,] a Pythagorean philosopher, born at Metapontum, held, it is said, the doctrine that fire was the origin of all things.

Hippeau, e'pō', (CÉLESTIN,) a French littérateur, born at Niort in 1803, published a "History of Ancient and Modern Philosophy," (1833,) etc. Died in 1883.

Hippel, von, fon hip'pẹl, (THEODOR GOTTLIEB,) a German humorist and original thinker, born at Gerdauen, in Prussia, in 1741. He studied law, and became in 1780 burgomaster of Königsberg. He claimed for women admission to civil offices and a greater social equality. Among his works are a "Treatise on Marriage," ("Ueber die Ehe," 1774,) "Designs after Nature," (1790,) an Autobiography, (1800,) and "The Education of Women," (1801.) His character was eccentric. Died in 1796.

Hippias. See HIPPARCHUS and HARMODIUS.

Hip'pĭ-ȧs, [Ἱππίας,] a Greek sophist, born at Elis, was a contemporary of Socrates. His character is exhibited by Plato in his dialogue called "Hippias Major."

Hip'pĭs-ley or Hippesley, (Sir JOHN COXE,) an Englishman, born in Somersetshire in 1765, was returned to Parliament about 1790. He wrote a "Treatise on Prison Discipline," (1823.) Died in 1825.

Hip'po or Hip'pon, ['Ιππων,] a Greek philosopher, who is supposed to have lived in the fifth century B.C., and to have been a native of Samos, or of Rhegium. He held that moisture, or water, is the principle of all things, and derived much of his system from Thales.

Hippocrate. See HIPPOCRATES.

Hip-poc'ra-tēs, [Gr. Ἱπποκράτης; Fr. HIPPOCRATE, ē'po'krăt'; It. IPPOCRATE, ĕp-pok'rā-tà,] the most eminent physician of antiquity, justly styled the "Father of Medicine," was born in the island of Cos in 460 B.C., and was contemporary with Socrates and Plato. He was the son of Heraclides, a descendant of Esculapius, from whom he derived his first lessons in medicine. His family, the Asclepiadæ, for many generations had practised the same art. The materials for writing his personal history are deficient. He is said to have studied medicine at Athens under Herodicus, and to have learned philosophy of Gorgias of Leontini, after which he practised and taught in Cos, also in Thessaly, and at the court of Perdiccas, King of Macedonia, etc. Soranus relates that he acquired fame by checking the ravages of the plague in Athens, and was rewarded with the freedom of that city, and with other honours. The story that he refused the invitation and magnificent offers of Artaxerxes, is by some discredited.

His superior talents, his rare sagacity, his signal success, and his devoted humanity, inspired universal confidence and respect. He had a great number of pupils, from whom he exacted an oath that they would never abuse their trust by criminal practice, nor divulge professional secrets. He held that the body is composed of four primary elements, fire, air, earth, and water, which produce the four cardinal humours, blood, phlegm, bile, and black bile. He knew but little of anatomy. He carried forward the reform begun by his ancestors, in substituting experiment and observation for speculative theories. He paid more attention than his predecessors to diet and changes of weather. Among the most remarkable of his discoveries is that of critical days in fevers. Of the numerous (Greek) works ascribed to him, it is probable that some were composed by other writers, as there were several noted physicians of the same name. He died at Larissa, at an age which is variously stated between eighty-five and one hundred and nine years. As an inventor he is unrivalled by any physician of ancient or modern times. Among his chief works are "Prognostics," "Epidemics," "On Regimen," and "On Air, Water, and Locality." Of the eighty-seven extant treatises ascribed to him, only a few are undoubtedly genuine.

Hippocrates, a Syracusan, shared with his brother Epicydes the command of the army which defended Syracuse against Marcellus, 213 B.C. Died in 212 B.C.

Hippocrates OF CHIOS, a noted Greek geometer, who lived in the fifth century before Christ. He studied at Athens, where he opened a celebrated school. He first discovered the quadrature of the lune.

Hip-po-da-mī'a [Gr. Ἱπποδάμεια] or Hip-pod'a-me, a daughter of ŒNOMAUS, which see.

Hip-pod'a-mus ['Ιππόδαμος] OF MILETUS, an eminent Greek architect, lived about 440 B.C. He built the Piræus of Athens, under the order of Pericles, and planned the city of Rhodes, about 408 B.C.

Hippolyte. See HIPPOLYTUS.

Hip-pol'ў-te, ['Ιππολύτη,] the Queen of the Amazons, was called a daughter of Mars. The poets feigned that he had a girdle coveted by Eurystheus, who ordered Hercules to bring it to him. She was killed by Hercules.

Hip-pol'ў-tus, [Fr. HIPPOLYTE, e'po'lèt'; It. IPPOLITO, ĕp-pol'e-to,] SAINT, a Christian bishop and ecclesiastical writer, who has recently attracted great attention on the part of scholars and theologians. He was dissident Bishop of Portus, (the harbour of Rome,) and the author of numerous learned works, highly extolled by Eusebius, Jerome, and other Christian Fathers. After occupying the see of Portus eighteen years or more, he probably died in exile in Sardinia about 238 A.D.

In 1842 M. Minas found at Mount Athos a Greek manuscript on "Heresies," which, at first ascribed to Origen, proved to be a work of Hippolytus, entitled a "Refutation of all the Heresies." This is a work of great interest and importance as a monument of the social state, intellectual improvement, and doctrinal belief of the Christians of the third century. Bunsen published in 1852, in English, "Hippolytus and his Age; or, The Doctrine and Practice of the Church of Rome under Commodus and A. Severus, and Ancient and Modern Christianity compared," (in 4 vols.)

Hippolytus, ['Ιππόλυτος,] a son of Theseus and Hippolyte, or Antiope. The poets relate that his stepmother Phædra made to him amorous overtures which he rejected, that she then by calumny induced Theseus to curse him, and that, at the request of Theseus, Neptune caused the horses of Hippolytus to become unruly, and to drag him until he was dead.

Hip-pom'ę-don, ['Ιππομέδων,] a Spartan warrior, was a son of Agesilaus, and a cousin of King Agis IV. He supported Agis in his efforts to reform the Spartan institutions. He was living in 220 B.C.

Hip-po'na, the name of a goddess who presided over horses. Her statues were placed in stables.

Hip'po-nax, ['Ιππώναξ,] a Greek poet, who lived about 540 B.C., was a native of Ephesus. Having been expelled from that city by its tyrants, he removed to Clazomene. He wrote satires, of which only a few fragments now remain. He was the first who employed the modification of the Iambic metre termed Choliambic.

Hī'ram, King of Tyre, began to reign about 1025 B.C. He was contemporary with David and Solomon, with whom he formed an alliance and always maintained friendly relations. He was a wise and successful ruler.

Hirtius, hir'she-us, (AULUS,) a Roman consul and general, was a patrician by birth. Cicero, who was his intimate friend, speaks highly of his talents. He served under Cæsar in the Gallic war, and supported his party in the civil war. After the death of Cæsar, Hirtius joined Brutus against Antony, and was elected consul with C. Vibius Pansa. In 43 B.C. these consuls gained a victory over Antony at Mutina, (Módena;) but Hirtius was killed in the action. He is supposed to be the author of the continuation of "Cæsar's Commentaries" which forms the eighth book of the "Gallic War," and also of two other treatises on the campaigns of Cæsar, viz., the Alexandrian and the African.

Hitch'cock, (CHARLES HENRY,) Ph.D., an American geologist, a son of Prof. Edward Hitchcock, was born at Amherst, Massachusetts, August 23, 1836. He graduated at Amherst College in 1856. He studied divinity at New Haven, and science at the Royal School of Mines, London. He was professor of geology at Lafayette College, Easton, Pennsylvania, 1866–70, and afterwards was professor of the same science in Dartmouth College. He published many scientific papers, and several volumes of reports prepared in connection with various State geological surveys.

Hitch'cock, (EDWARD,) an eminent American geologist, born at Deerfield, Massachusetts, May 24, 1793. He became pastor of the Congregational church in Conway, Massachusetts, in 1821, and professor of chemistry and natural history in Amherst College in 1825. In 1840 he published his "Elementary Geology," a valuable work, which passed through twenty-five or more editions. From 1845 to 1854 he was president of Amherst College, the prosperity of which increased greatly under his direction. He became about 1845 professor of natural theology and geology in that institution. Having been appointed State geologist for Massachusetts, he made a geological survey of that State, and wrote "Reports on the Geology of Massachusetts," (1833–41.) Among his numerous works are "The Geology of the Connecticut Valley," (1823,) "The Religion of Geology and its Connected Sciences," (1851,) and "Illustrations of Surface-Geology," (1857.) By his exposition of the fossil footprints of the Connecticut valley he originated a new branch of science, called Ichnology. He published in 1848 "Fossil Footprints in the United States." He was the chief founder and first president of the American Geological Association. Died in 1864.

Hitchcock, (ETHAN ALLEN,) an American writer and military officer, a grandson of Ethan Allen, was born in Vergennes, Vermont, in 1798. He graduated at West Point in 1817, and served in the Seminole war in Florida. In the war with Mexico he was attached to the staff of General Scott, and in 1847 promoted to the rank of brigadier-general. He was subsequently sent to California, as commandant of the Pacific division, but he returned in 1854, and the next year resigned his commission. He wrote "Swedenborg a Hermetic Philosopher," (1858.) Died in 1870.

Hitchcock, (PETER,) an American jurist, born in Cheshire, Connecticut, in 1780, graduated at Yale in 1801. He represented a district of Ohio in Congress from 1817 to 1819, and was subsequently judge of the supreme court of the State for twenty-eight years, for six years of which period he was chief justice. Died in 1853.

Hitch'cock, (ROSWELL DWIGHT,) D.D., LL.D., an American clergyman, was born at East Machias, Maine, August 15, 1817. He graduated at Amherst College in 1836, and studied divinity at Andover Seminary. He was a professor in Bowdoin College from 1852 to 1855, became professor of church history in Union Theological Seminary in New York in 1855, and in 1880 was chosen its president. Among his works are a "Life of Edward Robinson," (1863,) an "Analysis of the Bible," (1869,) and "Socialism," (1878.) Died June 16, 1887.

Hittorf, hit'tōrf or he'tōrf', (JACQUES IGNACE,) an eminent architect and antiquary, born at Cologne in 1793, was a pupil of Bélanger. He was appointed architect to the King of France in 1818, after which he visited Italy. He commenced about 1834 the church of Saint Vincent de Paul, (in the Italian style,) and designed the remarkable works of the Place de Concorde. Among his capital works are the Grand Circus, (1840,) the Panorama, the roof of which is supported by twelve iron cables, and the Cirque-Napoléon, (1851.) M. Hittorf acquired a European reputation by these structures, and by his writings on classical art, namely, "Polychromic Architecture of the Greeks," (1830,) "Modern Architecture of Sicily," (1837,) and "Ancient Architecture of Sicily." He was a member of the Institute. Died in 1867.

Hjelm, he-ĕlm', (PETER JACOB,) a Swedish mineralogist, born at Wexio in 1746, was president of the Academy of Sciences. Died in 1813.

Hjort, he-ort' or hyort, (PEDER,) a Danish grammarian, born near Copenhagen in 1793. After an extensive tour in France and Italy, he became professor of German at Soröe. He wrote several successful works on grammar, among which are "Tydsk Grammatik for Dansktalende," ("German Grammar for the Use of Danes," 5th edition, 1851,) "Tydsk Läsebog for Dansktalende," ("German Reader for the Use of Danes," 3d edition, 1843,) and "Den Danske Börneven," ("The Danish Child's Friend." Died November 11, 1871.

Hlin, hleen, Hlina, hlee'na, or Lyna, lee'na, [supposed to be derived from hlyna, to "warm" or "become warm,"] in the Northern mythology, a goddess, whose office it is to watch over those whom Frigga wishes to guard from peril. As Frigga represents the earth's fertility, so Hlin typifies the mild warmth which protects the tender plants from the breath of the Frost-giants.

Hlodyn, hlo'din, [in all probability the same as HLUDANA, the Latin name of a deity of the ancient Germans,] in the Norse mythology, the mother of Thor, and probably another name for Fiörgyn or Fiörgvin, (also called the mother of Thor,) the goddess of the earth. Thorpe derives it from hlaða, (allied to the English "lade" and "load,") to "heap up," to "load." Fiörgynn (as a masculine noun) was said to be the father of Frigga.

See THORPE'S "Northern Mythology," vol. i. pp. 21 and 170.

Hlubek, hloo'bĕk, (FRANZ XAVER WILHELM,) a German writer on rural economy, born in Silesia in 1802. His principal works are "The Nutrition of Plants and Statics of Agriculture," (1841,) and a "Complete Treatise on Rural Economy," (2 vols., 1846.) Died Feb. 10, 1880.

Hōad'ley or Hoadly, (BENJAMIN,) an English divine, born at Westerham in 1676, took orders about 1700. His zeal for religious liberty and opposition to the High-Church principles caused his promotion in 1715 to the see of Bangor. In 1717 he preached a sermon before the king, from which arose the great Bangorian controversy. This was maintained by Snape, Law, and other partisans of the High Church on one hand, and Hoadley on the other. He was made Bishop of Hereford in 1721, and of Winchester in 1734. He wrote a "Life of Dr. Samuel Clarke," and a few other works. Died in 1761.

See "Biographia Britannica."

Hoadley, (BENJAMIN,) M.D., eldest son of the preceding, was born in London in 1705, and graduated in 1729. In 1742 he was appointed physician to the king's household, and in 1746 to that of the Prince of Wales. He wrote "The Suspicious Husband," a comedy, which was successful, and assisted Hogarth in the "Analysis of Beauty." Died in 1757.

Hoadley, (Rev. JOHN,) LL.D., brother of the preceding, was born in 1711. He took orders in 1735, and obtained the livings of Wrington, Alresford, etc. He wrote several short poems and dramas. Died in 1776.

Hōar, (EBENEZER ROCKWOOD,) an able lawyer, the son of Samuel Hoar, noticed below, was born at Concord, Massachusetts, in 1816. His mother was a daughter of the celebrated Roger Sherman. He graduated at Harvard in 1835, studied law, was admitted to the bar about 1840, and practised in Boston. In 1859 he was appointed a justice of the supreme court of Massachusetts, was attorney-general of the United States, 1869–70, and member of Congress, 1873–75.

Hoar, (GEORGE FRISBIE,) LL.D., an American Senator, born in Concord, Massachusetts, August 29, 1826, a son of Samuel Hoar, noticed below. He graduated at Harvard College in 1846, and at the Dane Law School, served in Congress, 1868–76, and was sent to the United States Senate from Massachusetts in 1877, and again in 1883. His principal published works are memoirs of Samuel Hoar and A. H. Bullock.

Hoar, (SAMUEL,) a lawyer, born at Lincoln, Massachusetts, in 1778, was the father of the preceding. He was sent by the Governor of Massachusetts to South Carolina in 1844, to protect the rights of certain free negro sailors who had been imprisoned in Charleston; but he was driven from that city by a mob before he could perform his mission. Died in 1856.

Hōare, (PRINCE,) an English artist and dramatist, born at Bath in 1754, was the son of William Hoare, noticed below. He studied painting at Rome, and in 1799 was chosen foreign secretary of the Royal Academy. He is chiefly known as the author of dramas, as "No Song, No Supper," "Lock and Key," etc. Died in 1834.

Hoare, (Sir RICHARD COLT,) a noted English antiquary, born in 1758, married in 1783 the daughter of Lord Lyttleton, and inherited the title of baronet in 1787. He gained distinction as a topographer and antiquarian by his "Ancient and Modern History of Wiltshire," and wrote several other works. Died in 1838.

Hoare, (WILLIAM,) R.A., an English historical and portrait painter, born at Bath about 1706. He was one of the original members of the Royal Academy. After studying many years at Rome, he returned to Bath, and worked with great success, especially in portraits. Died in 1792.

Hō'bart, (AUGUSTUS CHARLES,) known as HOBART PASHA, a naval commander, born in England, April 1, 1822, a son of the Earl of Buckinghamshire. He entered the royal navy in 1836, commanded the Queen's yacht, 1845–47, and served in the Crimean war. In 1861–65, being still an officer of the British navy, he commanded a blockade-runner on the coast of the United States. In 1867 he entered the Turkish navy, served against the Cretan insurgents, and was soon made an admiral and inspector-general of the navy. In 1881 he was made a marshal of the Turkish Empire. Died in 1886.

Hō'bart, (Sir HENRY,) was lord chief justice of the court of common pleas in the reign of James I. "Hobart's Reports" (1641) have been often reprinted.

Hō'bart, (JOHN HENRY,) D.D., born in Philadelphia in 1775, was ordained in 1798. He was successively pastor at New Brunswick, Hempstead, and Trinity Church, New York, and was chosen Bishop of New York in 1816. He published numerous theological works. Died in 1830.

See DUYCKINCK, "Cyclopædia of American Literature," vol. i.

Hobbema or Hobbima, hob'be-mâ, (MINDERHOUT; Ger. MEINDERT; Fr. MINARD,) an excellent Flemish landscape-painter, was born probably at Coevorden about 1638. Little is known of his personal history. His favourite subjects were simple rural and sylvan scenes diversified by a winding stream, a ruined tower, or a distant village. He excelled in perspective and colouring. His works are rare, and command very high prices. Over twenty thousand dollars has been paid for one. Died in December, 1709.

See PILKINGTON'S "Dictionary of Painters."

Hobbes, hŏbz, (THOMAS,) a famous English philosopher, born at Malmesbury in 1588. As tutor in the family of the Earl of Devonshire, he travelled several times on the continent with his pupils, and became acquainted with Gassendi, Descartes, etc. In 1628 he published a Latin translation of Thucydides, and in 1642 a treatise on government,—"Elementa Philosophica de Cive." He was a royalist in the civil war, and an advocate of unconditional obedience to the king. In 1647 he was mathematical tutor to the Prince of Wales, (Charles II.,) then in Paris. His treatise on "Human Nature" (1650) was followed by the "Leviathan," (a complete system of his philosophy, including his political, moral, and theological views,) which made a great sensation, and gave offence to theologians, and—though it was hostile to liberal principles—even to the royalists. In 1666 this work and his "De Cive" were censured by Parliament. Soon after the restoration, he received a pension of one hundred pounds. His paradoxical opinions were warmly controverted by Cudworth, Clarendon, and others. In 1675 he published a translation in verse of the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey," which drew from Pope the assertion that "his poetry is too mean for criticism." In his old age, which was passed at the seat of his patron, the Earl of Devonshire, he published a "History of the Civil War from 1640 to 1660," and other works. "A permanent foundation of his fame," says Mackintosh, "consists in his admirable style, which seems to be the very perfection of didactic language. Short, clear, precise, pithy, his language never has more than one meaning, which never requires a second thought to find. . . . His little tract on 'Human Nture' has scarcely an ambiguous or a needless word. . . . Perhaps no writer of any age or nation, on subjects so abstruse, has manifested an equal power of engraving his thoughts on the mind of his readers. . . . His style so stimulates attention that it never tires, and, to those who are acquainted with the subject, appears to have as much spirit as can be safely blended with reason." In another place he says, "Hobbes having thus struck affections out of his map of human nature, and having totally misunderstood (as will appear in a succeeding part of this dissertation) the nature even of the appetites, it is no wonder that we should find in it not a trace of the moral sentiments." "Hobbes," says Macaulay, "had, in language more precise and luminous than has ever been employed by any other metaphysical writer, maintained that the will of the prince was the standard of right and wrong. . . Thousands eagerly welcomed a theory which, while it exalted the kingly office, relaxed the obligations of morality, and degraded religion into a mere affair of state." ("History of England," vol. i. chap. ii.)

"Hobbes's politics," says Hume, in his "History of England," "are fitted only to promote tyranny, and his ethics to encourage licentiousness. Though an enemy to religion, he partakes nothing of the spirit of skepticism, but is as positive and dogmatical as if human reason could attain a thorough conviction in these subjects." He lived, however, in formal communion with the Anglican Church. Died in 1679.

Hob'house, (Sir BENJAMIN,) M.P., an English statesman, born in 1757, was a prominent member of the House of Commons from 1797 to 1818, held several civil offices, and was attached to the party of Fox. He wrote a "Treatise on Heresy," and "Remarks on France and Italy." Died in 1831.

Hobhouse, (JOHN CAM,) Lord Broughton, an English statesman and writer, born in 1786, was a son of the preceding. He became intimate at college with Lord Byron, in company with whom he visited Spain, Greece, and Turkey in 1809. He published in 1812 "A Journey through Albania, and other Provinces of Turkey, with Lord Byron," which was long the best account of that country, and, in 1816, "Letters on the Hundred Days, or Last Reign of Napoleon," (in 2 vols.) He was elected to Parliament by the Radicals or Liberals of Westminster in 1819, and obtained success as a speaker. In 1831 he became secretary of war in the Whig ministry. He was appointed secretary of state for Ireland in 1833, and was president of the board of control from 1846 to 1851. Died in June, 1869.

Hoc'cleve or Oc'cleve, (THOMAS,) an early English poet and lawyer, is supposed to have been born about 1370. He wrote "The Story of Jonathan," and other poems. "His poetry," says Hallam, "abounds with pedantry, and is destitute of all grace and spirit."

Hoche, hôsh or hosh, (LAZARE,) a French general, who rose from a very humble rank in society, was born at Montreuil, near Paris, in 1768, and entered the French guards at the age of sixteen. He favoured the Revolution of 1789, and was made a lieutenant in 1792. Having studied tactics, and served with credit at Thionville, Dunkirk, etc., he became in a short time successively general of brigade and general of division, and at the age of twenty-four commanded the army of the Moselle. In 1793 he defeated Wurmser and drove him out of Alsace, soon after which he was arrested by the Jacobin leader Saint-Just and imprisoned at Paris. The fall of Robespierre in 1794 restored him to liberty and command. Employed to subdue the royalists of La Vendée, he effected much by his address and moderation, and in 1795 defeated the enemy at Quiberon. In 1797, commanding the army of the Sambre and Meuse, he opened the campaign against the Austrians by a daring passage of the Rhine in their presence, and defeated them in several actions. In the contest between the Directory and the Legislative Councils, Hoche favoured the former, who invoked the aid of his army, but soon issued counter-orders and employed another in the service. He died, of poison, (as was suspected,) in 1797. He was one of the noblest spirits and ablest generals that the Revolution produced, and, if he had lived, might have been a formidable rival of Bonaparte.

Hochstetter, hoK'stĕt'tẹr, (ANDREAS ADAM,) a German Protestant divine, born at Tübingen in 1688; died in 1717.

Hochstetter, von, fon hoK'stĕt'tẹr, (FERDINAND,) a German geologist, born at Esslingen, April 30, 1829. He was naturalist to the Novara expedition around the world, 1857–59. He lived some years in New Zealand, and published "Geology of New Zealand," (1864,) and a much larger work on the same subject, in German, in 1866. He later became a professor in the Vienna Polytechnic School. He published "Ueber den Ural," (1873,) and "Die Erde," a popular work. Died at Vienna, July 17, 1884.

Hocquincourt, d', do'kăN'koor', (CHARLES DE MONCHY,) born in Picardy in 1599, became marshal of France in 1651, and commanded the royal army which was defeated by the Prince of Condé in 1652. He deserted to the Spaniards, and was killed at Dunkirk in 1658.

Hö'dẹr, Hö'dur, (Höðr,) or Höd, written also Hoder, the blind god in the Norse mythology. Through the cunning malice of Loki, he became the slayer of his brother Balder, whose death Vali avenged by killing Höder. (See BALDER, and VALI.)

Hodge, (ARCHIBALD ALEXANDER,) D.D., LL.D., an American theologian, a son of Dr. Charles Hodge, noticed below. He was born at Princeton, New Jersey, July 18, 1823, graduated at Princeton College in 1841, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1847, and became a Presbyterian clergyman. He was professor of didactic theology in a seminary at Allegheny City, Pennsylvania, from 1864 to 1877, and in the latter year was appointed to a professorship at Princeton. His principal books are "Outlines of Theology," (1860,) "Atonement," (1868,) "A Commentary on the Confession of Faith," (1869,) "Life of Charles Hodge," (1880,) and a "Manual of Forms," (1883.) Died November 12, 1886.

Hodge, (CHARLES,) D.D., an eminent American theologian, born in Philadelphia in 1797. He graduated at Princeton in 1815, and studied divinity at the Princeton Theological Seminary, in which he became professor of Oriental and Biblical literature in 1822. In 1840 he succeeded to the chair of didactic and exegetical theology, and in 1852 added to it the professorship of polemic theology. In 1825 Dr. Hodge established, and was for many years editor of, the "Biblical Repertory and Princeton Review," at that time the ablest theological quarterly in America, and the chief organ of the Old-School division of the Presbyterian Church. Two volumes of his contributions to this "Review," entitled "Princeton Theological Essays," were published in 1846–47, and a third volume, "Reviews and Essays," in 1857. He died June 19, 1878.

Hod'ges, (EDWARD,) Mus. Doc., an English musician and composer, born at Bristol, July 20, 1796. In 1838 he left England for America, and next year was appointed organist of Saint John's Episcopal Chapel in New York. He returned to England in 1863, and died in 1867.

Hodges, hŏj'ẹz, (NATHANIEL,) an English physician, who practised in London, and gained distinction by his faithful services during the great plague of 1665, when the most of the doctors fled from the danger. Hofer, ho'fẹr, (ANDREAS,) a celebrated Tyrolese patriot, born in the valley of the Passeyr in 1767. On the breaking out of the insurrection against the French and the Bavarian government, to which the Tyrol had been lately transferred, he entered into secret negotiations with the archduke John for the deliverance of the country. In April, 1809, with the assistance of an Austrian army, Hoefer, at the head of the Tyrolese peasantry, defeated the French and Bavarian troops at the Sterzinger Moose. In the May following, the Austrians, under General Chasteler, suffered a defeat from the superior numbers of the enemy near Wörgl. Soon after this the Tyrolese were again victorious in an engagement near Mount Isel; but, the Austrian army being withdrawn after the battle of Wagram, the country was once more invaded by Marshal Lefebvre. On the 13th of August, 1809, Hofer, with his army of Tyrolese peasants, signally defeated the French commander near Mount Isel, after a long and obstinate conflict; but, overpowered at last by the reinforcements sent from France, he took refuge in the mountains. Being soon after betrayed by a former friend, he was tried at Mantua, and was shot in February, 1810.

She produced about 1820, in Polish, her "Memorial of a Good Mother," which had a great popularity. She was married to Charles A. Hoffmann, with whom she removed to Paris about 1832. Among her works, which were published collectively in 1833, (in 10 vols.,) are letters, historical tales, essays, and biographies of eminent Poles. Died in 1845.

Hoffmann, (DANIEL,) a German Lutheran divine, born at Halle about 1538, was professor of theology at Helmstedt. He was censured for teaching that the truths of philosophy conflict with the truths of religion. Died in 1611.

Hoffmann, (ERNST THEODOR WOLFGANG; afterwards called ERNST THEODOR AMADEUS,) one of the most remarkable and original of German story-tellers, (Erzähler,) was born at Königsberg in 1776. He studied law, and subsequently received several minor appointments under the government. In 1816 he became counsellor of the royal court of judicature at Berlin. Died in 1822, his health having been previously undermined by dissipation. His gifted and versatile mind led him to the cultivation of music, poetry, and art. But he "is celebrated chiefly," says Dr. Hedge, "for his successful use of the magic and demoniac element in fiction. He does not seek to make the flesh creep and the hair bristle, but aims rather at the diaphragm. He views all these infernalia on the humorous side; and if any one trait is particularly prominent in his writings, it is irony." Menzel, after alluding to the strange combination which his mind exhibited of manliness, humour, poetry, and morbid sensibility, remarks, "From the devil down to a wry-faced child's doll, from the dissonance of life which rends the soul down to a dissonance in music which only rends the ear, the immeasurable kingdom of the ugly, the repulsive, the annoying, was gathered around him, and his descriptions paint alternately these tormenting objects, and the torments which they prepare for a beautiful soul, with inimitable vividness and truth." Again, he says, "Hoffmann's innermost being was music; and the prayer of Saint Anthony is never wanting to his hellish caricatures, nor the Christmas bell to the witches' sabbath." Among his principal works are "Phantasiestücke in Callot's Manier," (4 vols., 1814,) and "Serapions Brüder," (4 vols., 1819–21.) His various other tales, etc. would fill several volumes.

He became musical and dramatic critic for the London "Daily News" in 1846. Died in 1870.

Hogarth, (WILLIAM,) a celebrated satirical painter, born in London in 1697, was apprenticed to a silversmith, whom he left in 1718. He then earned a subsistence for some time by engraving, and studied drawing in the academy of Sir James Thornhill, whose daughter he married in 1730. He acquired skill in portraits, but soon exchanged that branch of art for one more suited to his original genius,—the dramatic or satirical species, in which he is unrivalled. In 1733 he published a series of engravings called the "Harlot's Progress," which had a large sale, and was followed by the "Rake's Progress," "Marriage à la Mode," "Industry and Idleness," "Beer Lane," and "The Enraged Musician." His pictures abound in comic humour, and display great skill in caricature, as well as great originality and fertility of invention. His works have also the merit of conveying useful lessons of morality. In 1753 he published his "Analysis of Beauty," in which he maintains that a waving line or curve is the essential element of beauty. In 1757 he became painter to the king. Died in 1764.

Hogendorp, van, vän ho'gẹn-dorp', (DYRK,) COUNT, a Dutch general, born at Rotterdam in 1761, was minister of war under King Louis in 1806. In 1811 he became general of division and aide-de-camp to Napoleon, whom he followed in the Russian campaign. After the battle of Waterloo he went to Brazil, where he died in 1830.

Hogendorp, van, (GIJSBERT KAREL,) COUNT, a Dutch statesman, brother of the preceding, born at Rotterdam in 1762. He united with several others to form a provisional government in 1813, and was president of the commission which framed a new constitution. He was minister of foreign affairs, and vice-president of the council, until he resigned in 1816. He wrote "Considerations on the Political Economy of the Low Countries," (10 vols., 1818–23.) Died in 1834.

See VREEDE, "Jets bij de Dood van G. K. van Hogendorp," 1834.

Hŏgg, (JAMES,) "the Ettrick Shepherd," born in Ettrick Forest, in Scotland, in 1772, was the son of a shepherd, and followed his father's employment until he was thirty years of age. In 1803 a collection of his poems was published, under the title of "The Mountain Bard," the proceeds of which (about £300) enabled him to take a farm. He failed, however, in this enterprise. After many struggles with adversity, he went to Edinburgh, to try his fortune in authorship, about 1810. Having issued a literary periodical called "The Spy," without success, he was encouraged by his friends to devote himself to poetry, and in 1813 gave to the public the "Queen's Wake," which procured him a high reputation as a poet. It is generally considered as his best work. His success stimulated him to the rapid production of many other poems, among which are "The Pilgrims of the Sun," (1815,) "Poetic Mirror," "Sacred Melodies," and "The Border Garland," (1819.) He wrote, in prose, "The Brownie of Bodsbeck, and other Tales," (1818,) "Winter Evening Tales," (1820,) "The Three Perils of Man," etc., and contributed to "Blackwood's Magazine." In 1820 he married Margaret Phillips, and resided afterwards on a farm at Altrive. Hogg is one of the principal actors and interlocutors in Christopher North's famous "Noctes Ambrosianæ." Died in 1835. "The Queen's Wake," says Professor Wilson, "is a garland of fair forest-flowers, bound with a band of rushes from the moor. Some of the ballads are very beautiful; one or two even splendid. 'Kilmeny' alone places our (ay, our) shepherd among the undying ones."

See WILSON, "Memoir of James Hogg," prefixed to an edition of Hogg's Works, Edinburgh, 5 vols., 1850; R. S. Hogg, (ROBERT,) LL.D., a Scottish botanist, born at Dunse in 1818. His works include "Hand-Book of Hardy Annuals," (1837,) "Manual of Fruits," (1848,) "British Pomology," (1851,) "Gardener's Manual," etc.

Hohenhausen, von, fon ho'ẹn-hŏw'zẹn, (ELIZABETH PHILIPPINE AMALIE,) BARONESS, a German poetess, born near Cassel in 1789, wrote lyric poems entitled "Spring Flowers," (1817,) and translated Byron's "Corsair," and some of the works of Sir Walter Scott. Died at Frankfort, December 2, 1857.

Hohenlohe, ho'ẹn-lo'ẹh, a celebrated family of German princes. The Protestant line includes the houses of Hohenlohe-Langenburg, Hohenlohe-Oehringen, and Hohenlohe-Ingelfingen. The Catholic line includes the houses of Hohenlohe-Bartenstein-Bartenstein, Hohenlohe-Bartenstein-Jagstberg, and Hohenlohe-Waldenburg-Schillingsfürst.

Hohenlohe-Ingelfingen, ho'ẹn-lo'ẹh ing'ẹl-fing'ẹn, (FRIEDRICH LUDWIG,) PRINCE, a Prussian general, born in 1746. He distinguished himself in the campaigns of 1792 and 1793, and obtained command of an army in 1795. He commanded the Prussian forces which were defeated by Napoleon at Jena on the 14th of October, 1806. On the 16th the king gave him command of all the troops that had escaped from Jena and Auerstadt. He was compelled to abandon Berlin to the enemy, and soon after was taken prisoner, with about 15,000 men, at Prentzlow. He retired to private life, and died in 1817 or 1818.

Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst, von, fon ho'ẹn-lo'ẹh-shil'lings-fürst', (CHLODWIG KARL VICTOR,) PRINCE, a German diplomatist, born March 31, 1818. He early took an active part in Bavarian politics. Himself a Catholic, he opposed the ultramontanes, and was the leader of the liberals in every anti-clerical movement in Bavaria, previous to the foundation of the new German Empire. Though he had always been a zealous anti-Prussian, he was accused during the Austro-Prussian war of favouring Bismarck's designs; and afterwards he was active in establishing the new empire. In 1874 he was sent as German ambassador to Paris. In the German Reichstag he has usually given Bismarck's policy an unqualified support.

Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst, von, (GUSTAV ADOLF,) PRINCE, a German cardinal, a brother of the preceding, born at Rottenburg, February 26, 1823. He studied law and divinity at Erfurt, Bonn, Breslau, Munich, and Rome, was ordained a priest by Pius IX. in 1849, and was made secret chamberlain and almoner to the pope, and Bishop of Edessa. In 1866 he was made a cardinal-priest, and in 1879 a cardinal-bishop and archpriest of Santa Maria Maggiore, holding the see of Albano. In 1884 he with difficulty obtained leave to resign his bishopric, and retired to Germany.

Hohenlohe-Waldenburg-Schillingsfürst, ho'ẹn-lo'ẹh vâl'dẹn-bōōrg' shil'lings-fürst', (ALEXANDER LEOPOLD FRANZ EMMERICH,) PRINCE OF, a Hungarian prelate, born at Kupferzelle in 1794. He professed to cure disease by prayer. Died in 1849.

Hohenstaufen, ho'ẹn-stŏw'fẹn, [from hoch, "high," and Staufen, "hill" or "eminence,"] in the singular, Hohenstaufe, ho'ẹn-stŏw'fẹh, a celebrated family of German princes, who reigned from 1138 to 1254. The first of the line, FRIEDRICH VON BÜREN, received the name on account of having removed his dwelling from a valley auf den Staufen, ("up the hill" or "mountain.") His son, FRIEDRICH VON STAUFEN, was rewarded by the emperor Henry IV. for his eminent services by the duchy of Suabia and the hand of his daughter Agnes. Henry also made him Regent of Germany while he fought against the pope in Italy. Friedrich died in 1105, leaving two sons, Friedrich and Conrad, the latter of whom was crowned King of Germany, with the title of CONRAD III. His nephew, FRIEDRICH BARBAROSSA, the most celebrated of the line, was chosen emperor in 1152. (See FREDERICK I. of Germany, and KYFFHÄUSER.) The Hohenstaufen line ended with CONRADIN in 1268.

Hohenzollern, hō′ẹn-tsol′lĕrn, the name of an ancient princely German family, from which the imperial house of Germany and the reigning families of Roumania and Bulgaria are descended. The name is derived from the castle of Zollern, in Suabia, which is said to have been built by Tassillon, or Thasilio, about 800 A.D.

Höijer, hö′e-yẹr, (BENJAMIN CARL HENRIK,) an eminent Swedish philosopher, born in Dalecarlia in 1767. His promotion was hindered by the liberal political principles of his youth. He produced a treatise "On the Progress of Critical Philosophy," an "Outline of the History of the Fine Arts," and other works. In 1808 he became professor of philosophy at Upsal, where he gained a high reputation as a lecturer. Died in 1812.

Ho′kan-son, (OLOF,) a Swedish orator, originally a peasant, born in the province of Bleking in 1695, was elected in 1726 to the Diet, in which he acquired great influence by his prudence and eloquence. Died in 1769.

Holanda, de, dā o-lăn′dā, (FRANCISCO,) a Portuguese painter, born in 1518, studied in Rome, and appears to have returned to Portugal. He painted portraits for Charles V. of Germany, and was skilful in miniature. Under the patronage of John III. he painted oil pictures for the palaces and churches of Lisbon. Died in 1584.

Holbach, d′, dol′bȧK or dol′bȧk′, (PAUL THIERRY or THYRY, also given as PAUL HEINRICH DIETRICH and PAUL FRIEDRICH,) BARON, a skeptical philosopher, born at Heidelsheim (Palatinate) in 1723. He inherited a fortune, and passed all his life, except childhood, in Paris, where he was the patron and associate of the Encyclopædists. Diderot, Helvetius, Grimm, Rousseau, and other authors often met at his table. He translated from the German several works on chemistry and mineralogy. His atheistic opinions were developed in his "System of Nature," ("Le Système de la Nature," 1770,) under the pseudonym of MIRABAUD, the morality of which book Voltaire stigmatized as execrable. It was also refuted by Frederick the Great. Holbach was the reputed author of other works, among which were "The Social System," (1773,) and "La Morale universelle," (1776.) Died in 1789.

Holbein VON HOLBEINSBERG, hol′bīn fon hol′bīnz-bĕrG′, (FRANZ,) a popular German dramatist and actor, born near Vienna in 1779; died in 1855.

Holbein, (HANS,) THE ELDER, a German painter of Augsburg, born about 1450. Among his master-pieces are the scenes from the life of Saint Paul in the church of Saint Paul at Augsburg. He died in 1526, leaving three sons, AMBROSE, BRUNO, and HANS, who were artists; the last-named rose to great eminence.

Holbein, (HANS,) THE YOUNGER, one of the most celebrated German painters, born at Grünstadt in 1497. At an early age he removed to Bâle, where, after practising his art for a time, he was recommended by Erasmus to the English chancellor, Sir Thomas More. After residing in his family about three years, Holbein was introduced to King Henry VIII., who gave him abundant employment and bestowed upon him a large pension. He devoted himself, while in England, chiefly to portrait-painting; and his numerous productions in this department are esteemed master-pieces. His drawings, upwards of eighty in number, representing the principal personages of Henry's court, are characterized by Walpole as "exceedingly fine, and possessing a strength and vivacity equal to the most perfect portraits." Holbein died in London, of the plague, in 1554, or, according to R. N. Wornum and others, in 1543. Among his greatest historical pictures are the celebrated "Dance of Death," the "Adoration of the Shepherds and Kings," and a "Last Supper." His portraits of Sir Thomas More and of Erasmus also deserve especial mention. "His works," observes Cunningham, "have sometimes an air of stiffness, but they have always the look of truth and life. He painted with great rapidity and ease, wrought with his left hand, and dashed off a portrait at a few sittings." Holbein was also a skilful architect and wood-engraver.

Holbein, (SIGISMUND,) a German painter and engraver, is supposed to have been an uncle of the preceding. Died after 1540.

Holberg, von, fon hol′bĕRG, (LUDWIG,) BARON, an eminent Danish author and comic poet, born of poor parents, at Bergen, Norway, in 1684. In youth he was employed as a private tutor, and learned French, Italian, and English. He studied philosophy at Oxford, England, for about two years. Impelled by a love of travelling, he visited many countries of Europe, and was afterwards professor of eloquence at Copenhagen. About 1720 he published his heroic-comic poem "Peder Paars," which was immensely popular. His celebrity was increased by numerous comedies which appeared between 1723 and 1746. One of his best comedies is "The Busy Idler; or, The Man who never has Time." His fertile mind enriched nearly every department of literature, and raised him to affluence. His talent for satire is displayed in "Niels Klim's Subterranean Journey," in Latin, (1741,) the plan of which resembles "Gulliver's Travels." He also wrote a "History of Denmark," (1735,) and a "Universal History." Frederick V. created him a baron in 1747. He is the founder of the Danish theatre, and the first Danish author who excelled in humorous and satirical composition. Died in 1754.

Hol′bọurne, (Sir ROBERT,) M.D., an eminent English lawyer, was a member of Charles I.'s privy council during the civil war. He published several legal treatises. Died in 1647.

Hōl′brook, (JOHN EDWARDS,) M.D., a distinguished American naturalist, born in Beaufort, South Carolina, in 1795. He graduated at Brown University in 1815; and, having taken his medical diploma at Philadelphia, he prosecuted his professional studies for four years in Europe. He returned to the United States in 1822, and in 1824 succeeded to the chair of anatomy in the Medical College of South Carolina. In 1842 appeared his "American Herpetology, or a Description of the Reptiles inhabiting the United States," (5 vols. 4to,) which is said to have laid the foundation of that branch of science in this country. Died September 8, 1871.

Holcombe, hōl′kŭm, (WILLIAM H.,) an American homœopathist, born at Lynchburg, Virginia, in 1825. He became a resident of New Orleans. Besides several volumes of homœopathic literature, he published "Our Children in Heaven," (1868,) "Poems," and other works, including several brochures setting forth New Church (Swedenborgian) views. Died November 28, 1893.

Hol′croft, (THOMAS,) an English dramatist and translator, born in London in 1744. He was successively a groom, shoemaker, school-master, and actor. He wrote numerous dramas and several novels. His comedies "Duplicity," (1781,) and "The Road to Ruin," (1792,) were very successful. He made good translations of numerous French and German works, among which are Lavater's "Essays on Physiognomy," "The Posthumous Works of Frederick the Great," (1789,) and "Tales of the Castle." He was indicted for treason with Hardy and Horne Tooke in 1794, but was discharged without a trial. Died in 1809.

See "Memoirs of his Life," by himself, 3 vols., 1815; "Edinburgh Review" for April, 1804, and October, 1806.

Holda, hōl′dȧ or hol′dȧ, written also Holle, [probably from the German hold, "kind," "propitious," "lovely,"] an ancient German goddess, corresponding in some respects to the Frigga of the Northmen. She presides over aerial phenomena, and imparts fertility to the earth.

Hōl′dẹn, (EDWARD SINGLETON,) an American astronomer, born at Saint Louis, Missouri, November 5, 1846. He graduated at Washington University in 1866, and at West Point in 1870. He served in the artillery and engineer corps, United States army, was in 1873 appointed professor of mathematics in the navy, and in 1881 was made director of the Washburn Observatory. He published "Astronomy," (1877,) "Life and Works of Sir W. Herschel," (1880,) two volumes of "Publications of the Washburn Observatory," (1881, 1884,) etc.

Hōl'den, (GEORGE,) an eminent English Hebraist, born near Lancaster in 1793, became perpetual curate of Mayhull, at Liverpool. Among his principal works are "An Attempt towards an Improved Translation of the Proverbs of Solomon," (1819,) and "The Scripture Testimonies to the Divinity of our Lord," (1820.)

Holden, (HENRY,) a learned Roman Catholic priest, born in Lancashire, England, in 1596, lived for many years in Paris. He wrote, in Latin, an "Analysis of Divine Faith," (1652,) which was commended by Dupin, and other works on theology. Died in 1662.

Hōl'dėr, (JOSEPH BASSETT,) M.D., an American zoologist, born at Lynn, Massachusetts, October 26, 1824. He graduated in medicine in 1850, served in the medical department of the United States army, and was one of the founders of the American Museum of Natural History in New York. His principal works are a "History of the North American Fauna," (1878,) and "History of the Atlantic Right Whales," (1883.) Died in 1888.

Hōl'dėr, (WILLIAM,) F.R.S., an English writer, born in Nottinghamshire in 1614, published, besides other works, "Elements of Speech," (1669,) and "Treatise on the Natural Grounds and Principles of Harmony," (1694,) which, says M. Fétis, "is one of the best works on that subject." It is said that he taught a deaf-mute to speak. Died in 1697.

Hölderlin or Hoelderlin, höl'dėr-leen', (JOHANN CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH,) a German poet, born at Lauffen in or about 1770. He wrote "Hyperion, or the Hermit in Greece," (2 vols., 1799,) a romance, which has some beautiful passages, and "Lyric Poems," (1826,) which are admired for fervour of fancy and depth of thought. Died in 1843.

See WAIBLINGER, "Notice sur Hölderlin;" A. JUNG, "F. Hoelderlin und seine Werke," 1848; F. HALLENSLEBEN, "Beiträge zur Characteristik Hoelderlin's," 1849.

Hōl'dich, (JOSEPH,) a Methodist minister and writer, born in England, April 20, 1804, emigrated to the United States in 1818. He became secretary to the American Bible Society in 1849.

Hōlds'wŏrth, (EDWARD,) an English scholar, born in 1688, was educated at Oxford. He wrote a Latin poem, called "Muscipula," ("Mouse-trap.") Died in 1747.

Holdsworth, written also Holsworth, Oldsworth, and Oldisworth, (RICHARD,) an English divine, born at Newcastle-on-Tyne in 1590. He became professor of divinity at Gresham College in 1629, and master of Emanuel College in 1637. He left, besides other works, "Valley of Vision," in twenty-one sermons, (1651.) Died in 1649.

Hōle, (MATTHEW,) an English religious writer, born about 1640, was vicar of Stoke Courcy, in Somersetshire. He wrote "Discourses on the Liturgy of the Church of England," (6 vols., 1714–16,) and other works. Died about 1730.

Hole, (RICHARD,) an English poet, born at Exeter. He produced a poetical version of Homer's "Hymn to Ceres," (1781,) "Arthur," a poetical romance, (1789,) and a few other works. He became rector of Farringdon in 1792. Died in 1803.

Hölfken or Hoelfken, höl'fkėn, (GUSTAV,) a German writer on national economy, born at Hattingen, in Prussia, in 1811. He published, besides other works, "The Condition, Policy, and Development of the Power of England," (2 vols., 1846.)

Holger (hol'gėr) the Dane, a half-mythical national hero of Denmark, whose legend in its present form was worked up by Saxo Grammaticus. It is believed, however, that the French or Walloon form of the name (OGIER THE DANE) is older than the other, and that the word "Dane," as here used, at first signified not an inhabitant of Denmark, but a dweller in the dene or forest-region now called Ardennes. The Danish legend represents Holger as sleeping for ages in a vault under the castle of Kronborg, with his beard grown through a table of stone. At some future time he will awake, break the table, and rescue his country from her enemies.

Hol'inŝ-hed or Hol'ingŝ-hed, (RAPHAEL,) an English annalist, the date and place of whose birth are unknown. He published valuable chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland, (1577.) Modern historians have borrowed largely from him. Died about 1580.

Hol'kạr, the family name of the mahârâjahs of Indore, one of the most wealthy of the ruling Mahratta families of India. The ruler of Indore is often called "the Holkar." Mulhar Rao Holkar (q. v.) was the founder of the house. He was a shepherd's son.

Hol'kạr, (Jeswunt Rao, jĕs'wŭnt rä'o,) a son of Tuckagee, noticed below, was an able warrior, and a formidable enemy of the British. He defeated Scindia in 1802, and raised a large army. In the spring of 1804 war broke out between him and the British. Holkar defeated Colonel Monson's division of 12,000 men in July, near the Chumbul and Bannas Rivers. In November of 1804 he was surprised and routed by Lord Lake at Furruckabad. He made a treaty of peace in January, 1806. Died in 1811.

Holkar, (Mul'hạr Ra'o or Row,) a Mahratta chief, born at Hol, in the Deccan, in 1693. Having distinguished himself in war, he became ruler of a large part of Malwa. He died in 1766.

A daughter-in-law of the preceding, named AHALYA BAEE, (â-hä'le-â bā'ee,) or ALYA BHYE, (then a widow,) succeeded to the government on the death of Mulhar Rao Holkar, and during an administration of more than thirty years displayed extraordinary virtues both as a woman and a ruler. She was equally distinguished for her wisdom, her humanity and benevolence, and her moderation and sense of justice. Died in 1795.

For a very interesting account of her character and administration, see SIR JOHN MALCOLM'S "History of Central India."

Holkar, (Tuckagee,) supposed to be a nephew of Mulhar Rao Holkar, obtained possession of his dominions in 1767. He was the ally of Scindia against the Rajpoots. Died in 1797.

See GRANT DUFF, "History of the Mahrattas," 3 vols, 1826.

Holl, hol, (ELIAS,) an eminent German architect, born at Augsburg in 1573, studied his art in Venice. His capital work is the Rathhaus, or Town Hall, of Augsburg, (1618,) one of the finest structures for that purpose in Germany. He built also the arsenal, the church called "Mariahilf," and other public edifices of Augsburg. Died in 1636.

Höll, (FRANCIS,) an English engraver, born in Camden Town, March 23, 1815. His brother, WILLIAM HOLL, (1807–71,) was also distinguished as an engraver. Francis died at Godalming, January 14, 1884.

Holl, (FRANK,) an English painter, a son of Francis Holl, was born at Kentish Town, London, July 4, 1845, and was educated at University College, London. His reputation for history, life-pictures, portraits, etc., is very great. In 1878 he was elected an associate of the Royal Academy, and a Royal Academician in 1883. Died July 21, 1888.

Hol'lạnd, (EDWIN CLIFFORD,) an American poet and journalist, born in Charleston, South Carolina, about 1794. He edited for some time the "Charleston Times," and became noted as a satirist and controversialist. In 1814 he published a volume of "Odes, Naval Songs, and other Poems," originally contributed to Dennie's "Port-Folio." Died in 1824.

Hol'lạnd, (HENRY,) an eminent English architect, born about 1746. He was patronized by the Prince of Wales, (afterwards George IV.,) for whom he designed the Pavilion at Brighton, and Carlton House, the portico of which was much admired. He was architect of the old Drury Lane Theatre, begun about 1790, and afterwards burned. Died in 1806.

Holland, (Sir HENRY,) M.D., F.R.S., an eminent English physician, born at Knutsford, in Cheshire, in October, 1788. Having graduated at Edinburgh in 1811, he made the tour of Europe, and published, on his return, "Travels in the Ionian Isles, Albania, and Greece," (1815.) He settled in London, and gradually rose to great distinction in his profession. He became physician-in-ordinary to Prince Albert in 1840, and to Queen Victoria in 1852. In 1853 he was created a baronet. His principal work is "Medical Notes and Reflections," (1836.) Died in 1873. He married in 1834 Saba, eldest daughter of the Rev. Sydney Smith. She wrote a "Memoir" of her father. She died in 1867.

Holland, (HENRY RICHARD VASSALL FOX,) LORD, an English peer, born in Wiltshire in 1773, was the only son of Stephen Fox, second Lord Holland, and Mary Fitzpatrick. By the death of his father he succeeded to the peerage in 1774, at the age of one year. He inherited a large share of the talents and noble dispositions of the family of Fox. He was educated at Oxford, and married Lady Webster in 1797. In the House of Lords he spoke frequently against the administration, and supported the measures of his uncle, the famous orator Charles James Fox. His powers as a speaker were of a very high order. In 1802 he visited Paris, in company with his uncle and Lady Holland. He held the office of privy seal a few months in 1806. Throughout his career he was constant to the Whig party; and when they came into power in 1830 he was appointed chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. He published an excellent "Life of Lope de Vega," (1817,) and "Three Comedies from the Spanish," which are rendered with great poetical felicity. His "Foreign Reminiscences" appeared after his death, which occurred in 1840. In his time Holland House was the favourite resort, as Macaulay says, "of wits and beauties, of painters and poets, of scholars, philosophers, and statesmen."

Holland, (JOSIAH GILBERT,) M.D., (TIMOTHY TITCOMB,) a popular American author, born at Belchertown, Massachusetts, in 1819. In 1847 he became associate editor of the "Springfield Republican." He published a "History of Western Massachusetts," (1855,) "The Bay Path," a novel, (1857,) "Titcomb's Letters to Young People," (1858,) "Gold Foil," (1859,) "Miss Gilbert's Career," (1860,) "Lessons in Life," (1861,) "Titcomb's Letters to the Joneses," (1863,) "Plain Talks on Familiar Subjects," (1865,) "Bitter-Sweet, a Dramatic Poem," (1867,) "Kathrina," (1868,) "The Marble Prophecy," etc., (1872,) "Arthur Bonnicastle," (1873,) "The Mistress of the Manse," (1874,) "Sevenoaks," (1876,) and "Nicholas Minturn," (1877.) In 1870 he became editor of "Scribner's Magazine." Died October 12, 1881.

Hollar, hol'lär, (WENZEL or WENCESLAUS,) a celebrated Bohemian engraver and designer, born at Prague in 1607. Having met with the Earl of Arundel in Cologne, he accompanied him on his return to London, and was employed to engrave some of the pictures of his gallery. In 1639 he brought out his "Ornatus Muliebris Anglicanus," an admirable work, illustrating the dress of Englishwomen of all classes at that time. Owing to the troubled state of the country, he was, notwithstanding his genius and industry, soon reduced to great poverty. Many of his works are etchings. Died in London in 1677.

See a "Memoir of Dr. Holley," by his widow.

Hŏl'lingā-hĕad, (JOHN,) an English author, born in London, September 9, 1827. He became a journalist and theatrical manager. He published "Under Bow Bells," (1859,) "Rubbing the Gilt Off," (1860,) "Odd Journeys," (1860,) "Ways of Life," (1861,) "Ragged London," (1861,) "Underground London," "Rough Diamonds," "To-Day," (1864,) "Miscellanea," (3 vols., 1874,) and other works.

Hol'lins, (GEORGE N.,) an American naval officer, born in Baltimore about 1800. He became a commander in 1841, and bombarded Greytown, in Nicaragua, in 1852. He took arms against the Union in 1861, and commanded the naval forces which were defeated by Captain Farragut below New Orleans in April, 1863. Died January 18, 1878.

Hol'lins, (JOHN,) an English painter of genre and portraits, born at Birmingham in 1798; died in 1855.

Hol'lis or Hol'les, (DENZIL,) LORD, an English politician, second son of the Earl of Clare, and brother-in-law of the Earl of Strafford, was born at Haughton in 1597. In the reign of Charles I. he was one of the leaders of the opposition in Parliament, and in 1629 was condemned to imprisonment during the king's pleasure. He was one of the five members whom the king rashly attempted to arrest in the House of Commons on a charge of treason, (1642.) After the division between the Presbyterians and Independents occurred, Hollis was the leader of the former. He was expelled from Parliament at the time of Pride's Purge, and fled to France. He favoured the restoration, was created a peer by Charles II. in 1660, and was sent as ambassador to France in 1663. Died in 1680.

Hollis, (THOMAS,) a munificent benefactor of Harvard College, born in England in 1659. He was for many years a successful merchant in London, where he died in 1731. He founded two professorships in Harvard, —the Hollis divinity professorship and the professorship of mathematics. Besides books and philosophical apparatus, his bequests to the college in money amounted to about £5000,—probably equal to more than five times as much as these figures would represent at the present time.

Hollis, (THOMAS,) F.R.S., an English gentleman and republican, born in London in 1720, was an ardent friend of civil and religious liberty, and noted for his public spirit. He possessed a large fortune, which he used liberally for charitable purposes and in the publication of books. He published good editions of Toland's "Life of Milton," (1761,) and Algernon Sidney's Works. Died in 1774.

See HOLLIS'S "Memoirs," compiled by Rev. FRANCIS BLACKBURN, privately printed in 1780, 2 vols., with many fine portraits.

Hollis, (THOMAS BRAND,) an English gentleman, was a friend and the heir of Thomas Hollis, noticed above, (1720–74.) He contributed to Harvard College. Died in 1804.

See J. DISNEY, "Memoirs of Thomas B. Hollis," 1808.

Hollis, (THOMAS PELHAM.) See NEWCASTLE, DUKE OF.

Hollmann, hol'mân, (SAMUEL CHRISTIAN,) a German philosopher, born at Stettin about 1696, was professor of philosophy at Göttingen for about fifty years. He wrote, in Latin, several works on philosophy, metaphysics, and logic. Died in 1787.

Hol'lo-way, (THOMAS,) a skilful English engraver, born in London in 1748. He engraved the plates for Lavater's "Physiognomy," and the Cartoons of Raphael at Windsor. He spent several years on the latter, and had the title of engraver of history to the king. Died in 1827.

Hol'lў, (JAMES THEODORE,) D.D., an American-Haytian bishop, born of coloured parents, at Washington, D.C., in 1829. Though bred a Roman Catholic, he in 1856 became a presbyter in the Episcopal Church. In 1861 he founded an American colony of coloured persons in Hayti, where he became a missionary. In 1874 he was consecrated Bishop of Hayti.

Hōl'man, (JAMES,) an Englishman, distinguished as "the Blind Traveller," was born about 1788. He served for some years in the royal navy, until he became blind, (about 1812.) He performed a journey through several countries of Europe, (1819–21,) of which he published a narrative in 1822. After that date he visited the other continents, and published "Travels through Russia, Siberia," etc., (1825,) and a "Voyage round the World," (4 vols., 1840.) He was arrested as a spy by the Russians. Died in 1857.

Holman, (JOSEPH GEORGE,) an actor and dramatist, born in London. After performing in London and Dublin, he emigrated to the United States in 1800, and was manager of the Charleston Theatre. He wrote a few comic operas. Died in 1817.

Holmes, hōmz, (ABIEL,) D.D., an American divine, born at Woodstock, Connecticut, in 1763, graduated at Yale in 1783. He was pastor of the First Congregational Church, Cambridge, Massachusetts, from 1792 to 1832. In 1805 he published "American Annals," the result of great industry and research. "We consider it," says Professor Sparks, "among the most valuable productions of the American press." He was the father of Dr. O. W. Holmes, noticed below. Died in 1837.

See "Quarterly Review" for November, 1809, (by SOUTHEY.)

Holmes, hōmz, (ALFRED,) an English violinist and composer, born in London in 1837. His opera "Iñez de Castro," and his symphonies "The Youth of Shakspeare," "Robin Hood," and "The Siege of Paris," were performed with considerable success. Died at Paris, March 4, 1876.

Holmes, (EDWARD,) an English musician and writer on musical subjects, born in 1797. He published "A Ramble among the Musicians of Germany," (1828,) "The Life of Mozart," (1845), etc. Died August 28, 1859.

Holmes, hōmz, (GEORGE,) an English antiquary, born in Yorkshire in 1662, was clerk to the keepers of the records in the Tower. Died in 1749.

Holmes, (GEORGE FREDERICK,) LL.D., an American educator, born at Georgetown, British Guiana, August 2, 1820. He was educated in the University of Durham, England, was admitted to the bar in South Carolina in 1842, and held professorships in Richmond College, William and Mary College, the University of Mississippi, (of which he was president, 1848–49,) and the University of Virginia. He published English grammars, two Histories of the United States, (one for schools,) and other works, besides many review articles, etc.

Holmes, (ISAAC EDWARD,) a political leader in South Carolina, born in Charleston in 1796, rose to eminence at the bar, took a conspicuous part in the nullification movement of South Carolina in 1832–33, and from 1839 to 1851 was a member of Congress. Died Feb. 24, 1867.

Holmes, (NATHANIEL.) See HOMES.

Holmes, (OLIVER WENDELL,) M.D., a distinguished American author, wit, and poet, was born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, August 29, 1809. He graduated at Harvard in 1829, and commenced the study of law, but soon abandoned it for medicine. Early in 1833 he visited Europe, where for nearly three years he pursued his medical studies, attending the hospitals of Paris and other large cities. He returned to his native country in 1835, and took the degree of doctor of medicine at Harvard in 1836. In 1838 he was elected professor of anatomy and physiology in Dartmouth College. About two years afterwards he resigned this position, and in 1847 was chosen to fill the same chair at Harvard University, as successor to Dr. Warren. Holmes had distinguished himself as a poet even before he left college. In 1836 he read before the Phi Beta Kappa Society, at Cambridge, "Poetry, a Metrical Essay," which was soon after published in a small volume, with a number of his other poems. In 1857–8 he contributed to the "Atlantic Monthly" a series of papers entitled "The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table," which were followed in 1859 by another series, called "The Professor at the Breakfast-Table," and in 1872 by "The Poet at the Breakfast-Table." These contributions abound in humour and wit, and exhibit a shrewd insight into human character. His other principal productions are "Elsie Venner," (1861,) and "The Guardian Angel," (1868,) besides numerous minor works, among which are "Mechanism in Thought and Morals," (1870,) "Songs of Many Seasons," a collection of poems, (1874,) "John L. Motley, a Memoir," (1878,) "The Iron Gate, and Other Poems," (1880,) and a biography of Emerson, (1885.) As a poet, Dr. Holmes was especially distinguished for wit and humour joined with a remarkable felicity of expression. As a song-writer he had few, if any, superiors in America; but he particularly excelled in the playful vein. Among his effusions of this class we could not, perhaps, select an example which better exhibits his playful fancy or his wonderful facility and fertility of resources as a versifier, than his lines addressed to Agassiz when setting out on his scientific tour in South America. Died Oct. 7, 1894.

Holmes, (ROBERT,) D.D., an English divine, born in Hampshire in 1749. In 1790 he was chosen professor of poetry at Oxford, and in 1804 Dean of Winchester. He wrote odes, tracts, and sermons, and commenced an edition of the Septuagint, which was finished by Parsons. Died in 1805.

Holmes, (THEOPHILUS H.,) an American general, born in North Carolina, graduated at West Point in 1829. He became a general in the Confederate army in 1861, and commanded in Arkansas in 1862–63. Died June 21, 1880.

Holmskiold, holm'ske-old', (THEODOR,) a Danish physician and naturalist, born in 1732. He published a fine work on the Fungi in 1790. Died in 1793.

Holmström or Holmstrœm, holm'ström, (ISRAEL,) a popular Swedish poet, born at Stockholm, followed Charles XII. in his campaigns, with the title of councillor of war. Died in 1708.

Hol-o-fer'nēs, an Assyrian general, who lived at an uncertain epoch, and was killed by Judith, a patriotic Jewess.

See the Apocryphal Book of Judith.

Hol'royd, (JOHN BAKER,) Earl of Sheffield, an English political writer and military officer, born in Yorkshire in 1741. He edited some posthumous works of Gibbon. Died in 1821.

Holst, holst, (HANS PETER,) a Danish poet, born at Copenhagen in 1811. He published "National Romances," (1832,) "Poems," ("Digte," 1840,) and other works, written in an elegant style. His poem called "Adieu" ("Farvel," 1840) has been translated into many languages. Died in 1893.

See P. L. MÖLLER, notice in the "Dansk Pantheon."

Holst, von, fon holst, (HERMANN EDUARD,) a German historian, born at Fellin, in Livonia, (Russia,) June 19, 1841. He was educated at Dorpat and Heidelberg. He removed to New York in 1867. In 1872 he was called to a professorship of history at Strasburg, and in 1874 was made professor of modern history at Freiburg. He later visited the United States, and lectured at Johns Hopkins University. His writings include a very able "Constitutional History of the United States," and a "Life of J. C. Calhoun."

Holstein, hol'stīn, (JOHAN LUDWIG,) a worthy Danish statesman, born at Lübtz in 1694, became prime minister in 1735, and president of the Royal Academy of Sciences in 1742. Died in 1763.

See KOFOD ANCHER, "Cursus Vitæ Holsteinianæ."

Hol-ste'nĭ-us, [Ger. pron. hol-stā'ne-ŭs,] (LUCAS,) the Latin form of the name of LUCAS HOLSTE, (hol'stę,) an eminent German scholar, born at Hamburg in 1596. He studied at Leyden, and went to Paris, where he joined the Roman Catholic Church in 1626. His friend Peiresc recommended him to Cardinal Barberini, whom he accompanied to Rome in 1627. He became librarian to Barberini in 1636, and librarian of the Vatican in the pontificate of Innocent X. He projected great literary works, some of which he left unfinished. In 1630 he published a Greek and Latin edition of Porphyry's "Life of Pythagoras," to which he added an excellent notice of Porphyry. Among his other published works is "Demophili, Democratis et Secundi Sententiæ Morales Græce et Latine," ("The Moral Maxims of Demophilus, Democrates, and Secundus, in Greek and Latin," with notes, 1638.) Died in 1661.

Hōlt, (FRANCIS LUDLOW,) an English barrister, was queen's counsel and vice-chancellor of Lancashire from 1826 to 1844. For many years he was editor of Bell's "Weekly Messenger." Died in 1844.

Holt, (Sir JOHN,) an eminent English judge, born at Thame in December, 1642, was entered at Gray's Inn in 1658, and called to the bar in 1663. Having become eminent in his profession, he was chosen recorder of London; but for his firm opposition to the despotic measures of James II. he was removed. He distinguished himself in the Convention Parliament of 1688, and at the accession of William III. was appointed lord chief justice of the king's bench in 1689. In 1700 he declined the office of lord chancellor. He performed the duties of chief justice with wisdom, honour, and courage, until the end of his life. "His name," says Mackintosh, "never can be pronounced without veneration as long as wisdom and integrity are revered among men." Died in 1709.

See LORD CAMPBELL, "Lives of the Chief Justices;" "Life of Sir John Holt," (anonymous,) 1764; Foss, "The Judges of England."

Holt, (JOHN,) an English writer and teacher, born in Cheshire in 1742. He wrote, besides a few other works, "Characters of the Kings and Queens of England," (3 vols., 1786–88.) Died in 1801.

Hōlt, (JOSEPH,) an American minister of state, born in Breckinridge county, Kentucky, about 1807. He practised law at Louisville. In March, 1859, he was appointed postmaster-general. He succeeded John B. Floyd as secretary of war in December, 1860, and by his energy and zeal for the Union rendered important services in the critical times which ensued. About September, 1862, he became judge-advocate-general of the army. Died August 1, 1894.

Holte, hōlt, (JOHN,) an English school-master, born in Sussex about 1470, wrote the first Latin grammar ever printed in England, which was dated about 1497.

Holtei, von, fon hol'tī', (KARL,) a German poet and dramatist, born at Breslau in 1797. He produced many comedies and dramas, among which are "The Old General," and "Glory and Poverty," a volume of poems, (1826,) "German Songs," (1834,) and memoirs of his life, entitled "Forty Years," (1843–50.) Died in 1880.

Hölty or Hoelty, höl'tee, (LUDWIG HEINRICH CHRISTOPH,) an excellent German lyric poet, born at Mariensee, near Hanover, in 1748. He studied at Göttingen, where he formed friendships with Voss, Stollberg, and others. He supported himself for a time by translating from the English, and giving lessons, until his health failed. His elegies, idyls, and odes are admired for tenderness of feeling, artless grace, and naïveté. He died prematurely in 1776. The first edition of his poems appeared in 1783.

See J. M. MILLER, "Etwas über Hölty's Character," 1776; BOUTERWEK, "Geschichte der Poesie," etc.; LONGFELLOW, "Poets and Poetry of Europe;" notice of Hölty in an edition of his works published by Voss in 1804.

Höltzlinus, hölts-lee'nŭs, (JEREMIAS,) a German philologist, born at Nuremberg; died at Leyden in 1641.

Holtzmann, holts'mân, (ADOLF,) a German philologist, born at Carlsruhe, May 2, 1810. He was educated at Berlin, Munich, and Paris, and became professor of German at Heidelberg, where he died, July 3, 1870. Among his numerous works are translations of the "Mahâbhârata" and the "Râmâyana," and an "Old-German Grammar," of which only one volume has been published.

Holub, ho'loop, (Dr. EMIL,) a Bonemian traveller, born at Holitz, October 7, 1847. He practised the profession of medicine in the diamond-region of South Africa, and became a high authority on the ethnology, geography, languages, and natural history of trans-equatorial Africa. Among his works are "Seven Years in South Africa," (1880–81,) "African Colonization," (1882,) etc.

Hol'wĕll, (JOHN ZEPHANIAH,) born in Dublin in 1711. Having studied surgery, he went to India in 1732, and became a member of the council at Calcutta about 1755. He was one of those who survived the confinement in the "Black Hole," of which he published a narrative, (1757.) He succeeded Colonel Clive as Governor of Bengal in 1759. Holwell also published "Interesting Historical Events relative to Bengal and Hindostan, with the Mythology of the Gentoos," (3 vols., 1764–71.) Died in 1798.

Hol'y-dāy, (BARTEN,) D.D., an English divine, born at Oxford in 1593, was chaplain to Charles I. He wrote "Survey of the World," a poem, and translated Juvenal and Persius. Died in 1661.

Holyoak, hōl'yōk, (FRANCIS,) an English clergyman, born in Warwickshire about 1567, published a "Dictionary of Latin Words," (1606,) which was enlarged by his son Thomas. Died in 1653.

Hōl'yōake, (GEORGE JACOB,) an English agitator, born at Birmingham, April 13, 1817. He for many years edited "The Reasoner" and "The Present," organs of "secularism" in civilization and morals, and was for a time imprisoned on a charge of atheism, although he asserted that his system was not opposed to theology, though apart from it. He all his life refused to take an oath, from which circumstance he incurred much loss. He published a large number of books, among which are a "History of Co-operation," (1874,) "Uses of Euclid," "History of Middlesboro'," and a "Life of J. R. Stephens."

Holyoke, hōl'yōk, (EDWARD AUGUSTUS,) M.D., an American physician, was born in Marblehead, Massachusetts, in 1728. He graduated at Harvard in 1746, and for seventy-nine years followed his profession with eminent success in Salem, where he died, March 31, 1829. At the age of ninety-two he performed the operation of paracentesis, and on his hundredth anniversary partook of a public dinner given him by the physicians of Salem and Boston.

See "Memoirs of Edward A. Holyoke," Boston, 1829.

Hol'yoke, (SAMUEL,) an American teacher and composer of vocal and instrumental music, born at Boxford, Massachusetts, in 1771. He published "Harmonia Americana," (1791,) "The Columbian Repository of Sacred Harmony," (1809,) and other works. Died in 1816.

Hol'y-wood, Hal'i-fax, or Sac'ro Bos'co, (JOHN,) a noted mathematician of the thirteenth century, was professor of mathematics in the University of Paris. The time and place of his birth are unknown. He wrote a work entitled "De Sphæra Mundi."

Holzbauer, holts'bŏw'ẹr, (IGNAZ,) a German composer, born in Vienna in 1711, produced operas, symphonies, etc. "He has a good style," says Mozart, "and composes very fine fugues." Died in 1783.

Holzer, holt'sẹr, (JOHANN,) an eminent German fresco-painter and engraver, was born near Marienburg, in the Tyrol, in 1709. He painted numerous frescos in Augsburg of religious subjects, among which is "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian." He produced spirited etchings of "The Adoration of the Magi," after Bergmüller, of the "Ecce Homo," after his own design, and of other paintings. Died in 1740.

See ZAPF, "Holzers Leben," 1781, in MEUSEL'S "Miscellanien Artistischen Inhalts."

Holzhauser, holts'hŏw'zẹr, (BARTHOLOMÄUS,) a German devotee, born at Langenau in 1613, founded a community called "Bartholomäer." Died in 1658.

Homann, ho'mân, (JOHANN BAPTIST,) a German geographer and engraver of maps, born at Kamlach, in Suabia, in 1664. He settled in Nuremberg, and published many maps, which were more than ordinarily accurate. He formed a large collection of the same, under the title of "Atlas," (1716.) His establishment, called "Officina Homanniana," was well known throughout Europe. Died in 1724.

Homberg, hom'bẽRG, (WILHELM,) M.D., an excellent chemist, born of German parents at Batavia, in Java, in 1652, came to Europe at an early age. He studied chemistry and other natural sciences with Otto Guericke and Boyle, and visited the principal capitals of Europe in pursuit of knowledge. About 1685 he practised medicine at Rome with success, and in 1691 removed to Paris, where he was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences, to which he contributed many memoirs. He was patronized by the Duke of Orléans, who chose him as his first physician. He discovered boracic acid and Homberg's pyrophorus. Died in Paris in 1715.

Hōme, (DAVID,) a Scottish Protestant minister, who lived in France during the reign of James I. of England. He wrote "Apologia Basilica," (1626.)

Home, (Sir EVERARD,) an eminent Scottish surgeon, born in the county of Berwick in 1756, studied medicine with his brother-in-law, the celebrated John Hunter. He practised in London with distinction, and was president of the Royal College of Surgeons. He published "Lectures on Comparative Anatomy," and other professional works. Died in 1832.

Home, (HENRY,) Lord Kames, a Scottish judge, born at Kames in 1696, was called to the Edinburgh bar in 1724. After publishing several legal treatises, which were well received, he was appointed in 1752 a judge of the court of sessions, and took the title of Lord Kames. In 1758 he wrote a valuable work, entitled "Historical Law Tracts." His greatest work, "Elements of Criticism," (1762,) was regarded by some as an admirable performance, and is highly commended by Dugald Stewart. Dr. Johnson said, "The Scotchman has taken the right method in his 'Elements of Criticism.'" He was appointed one of the lords of justiciary in 1763. Died in 1782.

Home or Hume, (JOHN,) a popular Scottish dramatist, born at Ancrum in 1724. He was licensed to preach in 1747, and settled at Athelstaneford. In 1756 he became at once distinguished by the publication of his "Tragedy of Douglas," which was performed first at Edinburgh with unbounded applause, and is still very popular on the stage. "I think nobody can bestow too much praise on Douglas," says Professor Wilson. "There has been no English tragedy worthy of the name since it appeared." It rendered the author so obnoxious to the elders of the Kirk that he retired from the ministry. He was patronized by the Earl of Bute, who procured him a pension of £300. Home wrote several other dramas, much inferior to "Douglas," and a "History of the Rebellion in 1745." Mrs. Siddons once said "she never found any study [which, in the technical language of the stage, means the getting verses by heart] so easy as that of Douglas." Died in 1808.

Ho'mer, [Gr. Ὅμηρος; Lat. HOME'RUS; Fr. HOMÈRE, o'maiR'; Ger. HOMER, ho-mār';* It. OMERO, o-mā'ro,] the reputed author of the two great epics the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey," and the most celebrated poet that ever lived, is generally supposed to have been born at Smyrna, or Chios,† (Scio,) and to have flourished about one thousand years before the Christian era; but both the place and the century of his birth are involved in the greatest uncertainty. The best ancient authorities, including Aristotle and Aristarchus, represent him as contemporary with the Ionian migration which occurred about one hundred and forty years after the Trojan war. Of the two great poems above named, the "Iliad" has been aptly called "the beginning of all literature." In the opinion, indeed, of the greatest critics of antiquity, it was not only the beginning, but the end; it was not merely the first attempt at the production of a great poem, but the faultless model which excited alike the admiration and despair of all succeeding poets. In the words of Aristotle, Ὅμηρος . . . λέξει καὶ διανοίᾳ πάντας ὑπερβέβληκε.‡ "Hic omnes sine dubio," says Quintilian, "in omni genere eloquentiæ procul a se reliquit."§ Some other ancient writers speak in even stronger terms of praise.

Among the ancients, none appears ever to have doubted that Homer was a real personage, and that he was the author of the most wonderful poem of antiquity, (the "Iliad.") But before or about the time of the Christian era there was a class of critics who denied that the "Iliad" and "Odyssey" were the productions of the same author. They were called Χωρίζοντες, or "Separators." It cannot be denied that there is a remarkable difference between those works, not in one or two points only, but in several important respects. Perhaps the most striking difference is that which exists in respect to the character of the gods in the two poems. The gods of the "Iliad" are completely human in their character,—unless it be that they have more than human foibles or vices. They are capricious and selfish, and seldom, if ever, show much regard for justice. The deities of the "Odyssey" appear as the rewarders of merit and the avengers of sin or crime. There is, moreover, a marked difference in the spirit or tone of the two poems. To explain this difference, Longinus tells us that the "Iliad" was composed by Homer when he was in the vigour of life, while the "Odyssey" was the production of his old age.

Modern critics had seemed disposed to leave the question of Homer's age and the authorship of the Homeric poems very much where they had been left by the writers of antiquity, until a little before the close of the last century, when F. A. Wolf startled the world by announcing a new theory respecting the Homeric poems, (1795.) He maintained that, as writing was not in use among the Greeks until long after the time in which those poems must have been composed, it would have been wholly impossible for any poet, however great his genius, to compose and retain in memory even one such work as the "Iliad" or "Odyssey." For this and other reasons, he concludes that the two great epics which go under the name of Homer were really produced by a number of different authors, and that these separate productions were, after the introduction of the art of writing, thrown together as they happened to fit, so as to form a continuous whole. The inconclusiveness, not to say absurdity, of such a train of reasoning must, we think, be obvious to every unbiassed mind. We meet, even now, with persons who by two or three perusals can commit to memory the whole of such a poem as the "Lady of the Lake." "Who can determine," says Müller, "how many thousand verses one thoroughly filled with his subject . . . might produce in a year and confide to the faithful memory of disciples devoted to their master and his art?" When we take into consideration the fact that the mental activity of the ancients, instead of being divided and diluted among an endless variety of studies or pursuits, was concentrated and constantly exercised on a comparatively few, the retaining of even two such works as the "Iliad" and "Odyssey" will not, perhaps, seem more incredible than many feats of memory which are known to have been performed in modern times. Nor must it be forgotten that the poetry of Homer, unlike that of many of our great modern poets, is, generally speaking, remarkable for the simplicity and directness of its language; and these qualities, added to the marvellous facility and animation of the narrative, render the verse extremely easy to be learned and retained in memory.

The consummate art with which the various parts of the "Iliad" (though sometimes seemingly disconnected) are arranged and adapted so as to delay the dénouement and yet to heighten the interest till near the very end, proves the poem to have been, beyond all reasonable doubt, the work of one master-mind. But this master-mind may very probably have used materials prepared

* See principles of German pronunciation, in the Introduction.

† If the weight of authorities is in favour of Smyrna, the greater number would seem to be on the side of Chios. (See Smith's "Classical Dictionary.") Byron appears to give the preference to the latter; for he calls Homer

"The blind old man of Scio's rocky isle."
Bride of Abydos, canto ii

It has been suggested (and it seems highly probable) that Homer, though born at Smyrna, may have afterwards removed to Chios, where his family, or a branch of it, (the Homeridæ,) are said to have lived for several generations. Seven different cities are said to have disputed for the honour of having given birth to Homer, as expressed in the following couplet by Antipater of Sidon:

Ἑπτὰ πόλεις μάρναντο σοφὴν διὰ ῥίζαν Ὁμήρου,
Σμύρνα, Χίος, Κολοφὼν, Ἰθάκη, Πύλος, Ἄργος, Ἀθῆναι.

Literally, "Seven cities (or states) contended for the wise race of Homer, [i.e. the race or origin of the wise Homer,] Smyrna, Chios, Colophon, Ithaca, Pylos, Argos, and Athens." Some writers substitute Salamis for Ithaca and Rhodes (Ῥόδος) for Pylos.

‡ "Homer has surpassed all [other writers] in diction (or expression) and in thought."

for him by preceding poets, just as the consummate architect, when erecting an edifice designed to be the admiration of all coming time, may avail himself of the materials, and, for subordinate parts of the building, even of the designs, furnished by inferior workmen. There seem, indeed, to be strong reasons for believing that before the time of Homer there existed many poems treating of the events of the Trojan war, and that he, in selecting and combining the facts necessary to the plot of his great work, occasionally adopted some of the finest lines of his predecessors, at the same time changing or adapting others to suit his purpose, so as to give the whole poem the impress of his matchless skill and transcendent genius. This supposition will perhaps best explain the introduction into the poem of such a great variety of words or phrases differing in different parts of the work, as well as the marked diversity of dialects. It is well known that Shakspeare used freely, in some of his historic dramas, not only the ideas, but, in repeated instances, the very lines, of some of the poets that had gone before him. At other times he appears to have adopted some of the leading ideas, and perhaps many of the expressions, of previous dramatists, and yet to have so cast them into the mould of his own mind, and so coloured them with the hues of his wonderful imagination, that he may be said to have surpassed the fabled achievements of the alchemists, and transmuted his crude materials into something far more precious than gold.

But, while we claim it as a point established, that the "Iliad" is virtually and essentially the production of a single poet, we must admit that the question is still undecided whether the same Homer was also the author of the "Odyssey." "If," says the learned and accomplished critic already quoted, "the completion of the 'Iliad' and 'Odyssey' seems too vast a work for one man, we may perhaps have recourse to the supposition that Homer, after having sung the 'Iliad' in the vigour of his youthful years, in his old age communicated to some devoted disciple the plan of the 'Odyssey,' which had long been working in his mind, and left it to him for completion." (K. O. Müller's "History of Greek Literature.")

The prevailing belief that Homer was blind appears to have taken its origin from one of the so-called Homeric hymns addressed to the Delian Apollo, the author of which calls himself the blind poet who lived in rocky Chios. The hymn in question was considered by some of the most judicious of the ancient writers to be the production of Homer himself; but this view is not accepted by the best modern critics. The wonderful accuracy of many of the descriptions in the "Iliad" utterly precludes the idea of their having been written by a poet who had not himself been an eye-witness of the scenes which he paints so admirably. But he might, perhaps, have described in his blind old age scenes which had been indelibly stamped upon his memory in youth or early manhood. (See, on the various questions connected with the Homeric poems, Colonel W. Mure's "Critical History of the Literature, etc. of Ancient Greece," (1850,) and the able article on "Homerus," in Smith's "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography.")

Hō'mer, (Rev. Henry,) an English scholar, born at Birdingbury in 1752, was educated at Cambridge. He edited several Latin authors, and, in partnership with Dr. Combe, published a complete edition of Horace. Died in 1791.

Ho'mer, (Winslow,) an American painter, born in Boston, Massachusetts, February 24, 1831. He learned in youth the business of a lithographer, and afterwards began to draw on wood for engravers. In 1859 he established himself in New York, and was for a time artist and war-correspondent for a newspaper of that city. His war-pictures, and especially "Prisoners at the Front," (1865,) gave him great fame. He is a member of the National Academy, and resides at Scarborough, Maine.

Homère. See Homer.

Homeridæ, ho-mĕr'e-dee, (singular, Ho-mĕr'ĭ-dēs,) or Ho'mer-ids, the name applied to the family of the poet Homer. (See Homer, note †.)

Homerus. See Homer.

Homes or Holmes, hōmz, (Nathaniel,) D.D., an English theologian, ejected for nonconformity in 1662, was a believer in the fifth monarchy. He wrote the "Resurrection Revealed," and other works. Died in 1678.

Homeyer, hō'mī-ẹr, (Karl Gustav,) a German jurist, born at Wolgast, in Pomerania, August 13, 1795. He studied in Berlin, Göttingen, and Heidelberg; in 1824 was made extraordinary, and in 1827 ordinary, law-professor in Berlin. His principal works are an edition of the "Sachsenspiegel," and "Die Haus- und Hofmarken," (1870.) Died October 20, 1874.

Homeyer, von, fon hō'mī-ẹr, (Alexander,) a German soldier and naturalist, born at Vorland, in Pomerania, January 19, 1834. In 1874 he led an expedition into Central Africa. He is noted as an ornithologist and entomologist.

Homeyer, von, (Eugen Ferdinand,) a German ornithologist, born at Herdin, November 11, 1809. His best-known work is "The Migration of Birds," (1881,) and he is the owner of the largest collection ever made of European birds.

Ho-mil'ĭ-us, [Ger. pron. ho-mee'le-ûs,] (Gottfried August,) an eminent German organist and composer of church music, born at Rosenthal, in Bohemia, in 1714. Among his best works are a cantata for Christmas, and a number of motets. He was organist and director of music at Dresden. Died in 1785.

Hommaire de Hell, ho'mâr' dẹh hĕl, (Ignace Xavier Morand,) a French geologist, born at Altkirch in 1812, explored the regions which border on the Black and Caspian Seas, and left an account of his travels, in 3 vols. Died at Ispahân in 1848.

Hommel, hom'mẹl, [Lat. Homme'lius,] (Karl Ferdinand,) a learned jurist and ingenious writer, born at Leipsic in 1722. He became professor of feudal law at Leipsic in 1752, and of civil institutes in 1756. Among his works are "Literatura Juris," (1761,) a very piquant treatise on legal literature, "Rhapsodia Quæstionum in Foro quotidiè obvenientum," ("Questions occurring daily in the Forum," 5 vols., 1765–79; 4th edition, 7 vols., 1787,) and "Sceleton Juris civilis," ("Skeleton of Civil Law," 4th edition, 1767.) Died in 1781.

Hommelius. See Hommel.

Hompesch, von, fon hom'pĕsh, (Ferdinand,) the last grand master of the Knights of Malta, was born at Dusseldorf in 1744; died in 1803.

Honain, (or Honein,) ho-nīn', (Aboo-Yezeed or Abu- (Abou-) Yezîd, â'bōō yẹh-zeed',) otherwise called Honain-Ben-Ishâk, (bĕn is'hăk',) an Arabian physician, born at Heerah, (Hirah,) in Mesopotamia, lived mostly at Bagdâd. Died about 875 A.D. He translated into Arabic the works of Hippocrates, Galen, Euclid, etc.

See Ibn-Khallikan, "Biographical Dictionary;" Haji-Khalfa, "Lexicon Bibliographicum."

Hondekoeter, hon'dẹh-koo'tẹr, (Giles,) a noted Dutch landscape-painter, born at Utrecht in 1583, was the son of the Marquis of Westerloo. He often added to his landscapes highly-finished figures of birds.

Hondekoeter, (Gysbrecht,) a son of the preceding, and a painter of poultry, was born in 1613; died in 1653.

Hondekoeter, (Melchior,) an excellent painter, a son of the preceding, was born at Utrecht in 1636. He studied with his father and his uncle, John B. Weenix. He painted poultry, pea-fowls, and other birds, with a skill that has never been surpassed. The backgrounds of his pictures are adorned with beautiful landscapes. Among his works is "The Entrance of the Animals into the Ark." Died in 1695.

See Jakob Campo Weyerman, "De Schilderkonst der Nederlanders."

Hondius, hon′de-us, or Hondt, hônt, (ABRAHAM,) a Dutch painter and engraver, born at Rotterdam in 1638. He painted hunting-scenes, animals, and landscapes with success. "He often equals the best masters," says Descamps. Among his works are "The Burning of Troy," and "The Animals entering the Ark." He worked some years in England, where he died about 1692.

Hondius, (HENDRIK,) an engraver of maps and portraits, born at Ghent in 1573. His principal work is a series of portraits of one hundred and forty-four artists, mostly Flemings. He also engraved some pictures by Albert Dürer and Holbein. Died at the Hague in 1610.

See BASAN, "Dictionnaire des Graveurs;" STRUTT, "Dictionary of Engravers."

Hondius or De Hondt, dẹh hônt, (HENRY,) called THE YOUNGER, born in London in 1580, was accounted the best engraver of the family. He engraved portraits, landscapes, and history after several Flemish painters. Among his works are portraits of Queen Elizabeth and James I. Died at Amsterdam about 1650.

See BASAN, "Dictionnaire des Graveurs."

Hondius or De Hondt, (JOSSE or JODO′CUS,) a skilful Flemish engraver and geographer, born at Wacken about 1550, was the father of the preceding. He had a high reputation as an engraver on copper. He worked in London, and afterwards settled in Amsterdam, where he engraved maps of superior quality, and published new editions of the "Grand Atlas" of Mercator. Died in 1611.

Hondt, hônt, (WILLEM,) a Flemish engraver, a brother of Henry the Younger, born at the Hague in 1601.

Hone, ho′nẹh, (GEORG PAUL,) a German lawyer, born at Nuremberg in 1662, wrote "Iter Juridicum," and other works. Died in 1747.

Hōne, (NATHANIEL,) a portrait-painter, born in Dublin about 1730; died in 1784.

Hōne, (WILLIAM,) an English writer, born at Bath in 1779, resided in London, and failed several times as a bookseller. He wrote "The Political House that Jack Built," a satire, which was illustrated by Cruikshank and ran through fifty editions. He was prosecuted for his Parody on the Liturgy in 1818, and, having ably defended himself, was acquitted. In 1826 he began to issue in weekly numbers his "Every-Day Book," which had a large sale, and was commended by Professor Wilson, Scott, Lamb, and Southey. It was followed by the "Table-Book" and the "Year-Book," which were well received, but did not save the author from insolvency. He was in prison for debt about three years. Died in 1842.

Honoré de Sainte-Marie, o′no′rā′ dẹh sânt′mā′re′, [Lat. HONORIUS DE SANCTA MARIA,] called, after he entered the cloister, BLAISE VAUXELLE, (vō-sĕl′,) a learned monk, born at Limoges in 1651; died in 1729.

Ho-no′rĭ-us I., a native of Campania, was elected Pope or Bishop of Rome in 626 A.D. He is charged with assenting to the heresy of Monothelism. The Council of Constantinople, held in 680, condemned his doctrine on this point. Died in 638.

Honorius II., POPE, previously known as Cardinal Lamberto and Bishop of Ostia, succeeded Calixtus II. in 1124. Tebaldus was chosen pope at the same time by a number of bishops, but forbore to contest his claim. Honorius died in 1130. See, also, CADALOUS.

Honorius III., elected Pope in 1216, was a Roman by birth. His proper name was CENCIO SAVELLI. He crowned Frederick II. Emperor of Germany in 1220, in the hope that he would lead a crusade against the Turks. He was more successful in instigating the King of France to a crusade against the Albigenses. He died in 1227, and was succeeded by Gregory IX.

Honorius IV., POPE, (Cardinal GIACOMO Savelli,) a native of Rome, was elected in 1285 as successor to Martin IV. Died in 1287.

Ho-no′rĭ-us, (FLAVIUS,) a Roman emperor, the second son of Theodosius the Great, was born at Constantinople in 384 A.D. At the death of his father, in 395, he inherited the Western Empire, (his elder brother Arcadius having obtained the Eastern,) under the guardianship of Stilicho, a famous general, whose daughter he married. His court was held at Milan, and afterwards at Ravenna. About 402 Alaric the Goth invaded Italy, and was defeated by Stilicho at Pollentia. In 408 Stilicho was put to death by order of Honorius, who was a man of weak and vicious character. From this event may be dated the fall of the Roman power. Rome was taken and pillaged by Alaric in 410, and the empire went rapidly to ruin. He died, without issue, in 423, and was succeeded by Valentinian III.

Honorius de Sancta Maria. See HONORÉ DE SAINTE-MARIE.

Hontheim, von, fon hont′hīm, (JOHANN NIKOLAUS,) a German jurist and Catholic priest, born at Treves in 1701. He became Bishop (in partibus) of Myriophis in 1748, and suffragan of the see of Treves. He published under the pseudonym of JUSTINIUS FEBRONIUS a famous book against the usurpations of the popes, entitled "De Statu Ecclesiæ et legitima Potestate Romani Pontificis," (5 vols., 1763,) which was often reprinted. Died in 1790.

Honthorst, hônt′horst, or Hundhorst, hŭnt′horst, (GERARD,) a Flemish painter, called also by the Italians GERARDO DELLA NOTTE, ("Gerard of the Night,") because he excelled in nocturnal scenes. He was born at Utrecht in 1592, and was a pupil of A. Bloemaert. He worked in Rome and in England, where he painted portraits of the royal family and gained a high reputation. Among his works is "The Prodigal Son." He was a good colorist, and excelled in design. Died at the Hague in 1660. His brother WILLEM was a successful portrait-painter. Died at Berlin in 1683, aged about eighty.

See PILKINGTON, "Dictionary of Painters."

Hood, (ALEXANDER.) See BRIDPORT.

Hood, hōōd, (EDWIN PAXTON,) an English dissenting minister, born at Westminster in 1820. He wrote "Self-Formation," "William Wordsworth," a biography, "Life of Swedenborg," "Lamps, Pitchers, and Trumpets," "Oliver Cromwell," (1882,) "Scottish Characteristics," (1883,) etc. Died June 12, 1885.

Hood, hōōd, (JOHN B.,) an American general, born in Bath county, Kentucky, in 1831, graduated at West Point in 1853. He commanded a division of Lee's army at Antietam, September, 1862, and at Gettysburg, July 1–3, 1863. He lost a leg at the battle of Chickamauga, September 20, 1863, soon after which he was promoted to be a lieutenant-general. In the spring of 1864 he commanded a corps of the army opposed to General Sherman in Northern Georgia. He succeeded General Johnston in July as commander-in-chief of that army, which was then near Atlanta. General Johnston was removed because he had adhered to a cautious and defensive policy. Hood assumed the offensive, and attacked General Sherman on the 22d of July, and again on the 28th, but was repulsed with heavy loss. He was compelled to abandon Atlanta on the 1st of September, 1864. (See SHERMAN, W. T.) After he had damaged the railroad by which Sherman's army was supplied, General Hood invaded Middle Tennessee, attacked General Schofield at Franklin, November 30, and besieged Nashville. He was defeated on the 16th of December, 1864, by General Thomas, at the decisive battle of Nashville, where he lost fifty pieces of cannon, and was relieved of the command in January, 1865. Died August 30, 1879.

See "Southern Generals," New York, 1865.

Hood, (ROBIN,) a famous English outlaw, who is supposed to have lived in the reign of Richard I. Sherwood Forest was his head-quarters. His exploits are the subject of many popular ballads, which applaud his gallantry to the ladies and his generosity in sharing among the poor the spoils of the rich. He was the chief of a numerous band, who seem to have lived chiefly on the products of the chase.

See W. W. CAMPBELL, "Historical Sketch of Robin Hood and Captain Kidd," New York, 1853; "Edinburgh Review" for July, 1847; "North American Review" for January, 1857.

Hood, (SAMUEL,) VISCOUNT, an English admiral, born at Butley in 1724, entered the navy in 1740, and became captain in 1754. In 1780 he was made a rear-admiral, and was second in command in the West Indies. The next year he succeeded Rodney in command of the fleet, with which he fought De Grasse near the mouth of the Chesapeake, but failed to relieve the British army at Yorktown. He took part in the victory over De Grasse in April, 1782, and was rewarded with the title of Baron Hood of Catherington. In 1784, after a close contest with Fox, he was elected to Parliament, and in 1788 appointed a lord of the admiralty. In 1793 he commanded against the French in the Mediterranean and at the siege of Toulon. He was made, in 1796, Viscount Hood of Whitley, and afterwards an admiral. Died in 1816.

See CAMPBELL, "Lives of British Admirals."

Hood, (Sir SAMUEL,) cousin of the preceding, was a vice-admiral in the British navy, and a brave and skilful officer. He took part in the victory of Rodney over De Grasse in 1782, and in the battle of the Nile, (1798.) In 1806 he was returned to Parliament for Westminster, and captured three French ships near Rochefort. He was afterwards appointed to command in the East Indies, where he died in 1814.

Hood, (THOMAS,) a famous English humourist and popular author, born in London in 1798, was the son of a bookseller. He served an apprenticeship to an engraver, but soon exchanged that employment for literary pursuits. In 1821 he became sub-editor of the "London Magazine," by which he gained access to the society of many authors who have since risen to eminence. His "Whims and Oddities" (1826) displayed an abundant vein of inimitable wit and comic power. He issued the "Comic Annual" from 1830 to 1842, which was followed by his "Comic Album," "Whimsicalities," and "Hood's Own." His tales and novels were less successful than his humorous works. Among his most popular poems are the "Song of the Shirt," (which first appeared in "Punch,") the "Bridge of Sighs," and the "Dream of Eugene Aram." He was editor of "The Gem" for one year, and, in the latter years of his life, editor of the "New Monthly Magazine." Like poor Yorick, he was "a fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy." As a punster he is unrivalled. Some of his serious poems are exquisitely tender and pathetic. In 1844 he began to issue "Hood's Magazine," for which he wrote until his last illness. A pension of £100 which had been granted to him was transferred to his widow. Died in 1845.

See "Life of Hood," by his children, 1860; E. P. WHIPPLE, "Essays and Reviews;" R. H. HORNE, "New Spirit of the Age," 1844; "Edinburgh Review" for April, 1846; "Quarterly Review" for October, 1863; "Blackwood's Magazine" for January, 1827; "London Magazine" for December, 1826; "British Quarterly Review" for October, 1867.

Hood, (THOMAS, or "TOM,") a son of Thomas Hood, the humorist and poet, already noticed. He was born at Wanstead, England, January 19, 1835, and was educated at Pembroke College, Oxford. Among his works are "Pen and Pencil Pictures," (1854–55,) a volume of Poems, (1861,) some books for children, and a number of novels. In 1865 he became editor of "Fun," a London comic paper. Died November 20, 1874. His talent was much like his father's, but not so brilliant.

Hooft, hōft, (NIKLAAS,) a Dutch historical painter, born at the Hague in 1664; died in 1748.

Hooft or Hoofft, (PIETER CORNELIS,) an excellent Dutch poet and historian, born in Amsterdam in March, 1581. After leaving college he travelled in France and Italy, and filled several civil offices. He published about 1602 "Granida," a tragi-comedy, which is a master-piece. He wrote other dramas, and erotic poems of great merit, and translated Tacitus into Dutch. His chief prose works are a "Life of Henry IV. of France," (1626,) and a "History of the Netherlands,"("De Nederlandsche Historien," 2 vols., 1642–54,) which is esteemed a model of grace, purity, and vigour, both in thought and style. He has the honour of rendering his vernacular language more polished and classical than it was before his time. He was a friend of Grotius. "Though deeply religious," says the "Biographie Universelle," "he never ranged himself under the banner of any outward communion." Many critics assign him the highest place as a writer of Dutch prose; but, though a great purist, his style abounds in Latin idioms. Died at the Hague, May 21, 1647.

Hooge, de, dẹh hō′gẹh or hō′hẹh, written also Hoogh, (PIETER,) a Dutch painter of genre, born about 1644. Little is known of his history. His colour is good, his design correct, and his manner natural. He represents the effects of light with great skill. Among his works (which command high prices) are a "Supper," an "Interior," and a "Guard-Room." Died in 1708.

See DESCAMPS, "Vies des Peintres Flamands, Hollandais," etc.

Hooge or Hooghe, de, (ROMEYN,) an eminent Dutch designer and engraver, was born at the Hague about 1640, or, as others say, about 1650. He worked for a long time in Paris, and passed his latter years at the Hague. He had a rich imagination and great facility, but was deficient in correctness. Among his works are "The Entrance of Louis XIV. into Dunkirk," and "The Assassination of De Witt." Died in 1725.

See J. C. WEYERMAN, "De Schilderkonst der Nederlanders."

Hoogeveen, hō′gẹh-vān′ or hō′hẹh-vān′, sometimes written Hoogeven, (HENDRIK,) a Dutch Hellenist, born at Leyden in 1712, was successively rector of the gymnasiums of Breda, Dort, and Delft, and was an excellent grammarian. He is the author of a valuable treatise on "Greek Particles," ("Doctrina Particularum Linguæ Græcæ," 2 vols., 1769,) and "Dictionarium Analogicum Linguæ Græcæ," (Cambridge, 1800.) Died in 1791.

See ERSCH und GRUBER, "Allgemeine Encyklopaedie;" HARLESS, "Vitæ Philologorum."

Hoogstaad, van, vȧn hōg′stȧt′, (GERART,) a Flemish painter of history and portraits, born at Brussels, was living in 1661.

Hoogstraaten, van, vȧn hōg′strȧ′tẹn, (DAVID,) a Dutch scholar, a nephew of the following, was born at Rotterdam in 1658, and became a classical professor at Amsterdam. He compiled a Latin-Dutch Dictionary, (1704,) and wrote several elegant Latin poems, "Poemata," (1710.) Died in 1724.

Hoogstraaten, van, (SAMUEL,) a Dutch painter, born at Dort in 1627, was a pupil of Rembrandt, and the master of Houbraken. He painted portraits, landscapes, etc. with success, and wrote a good work on the theory of painting. Died in 1678.

His father, DIRCK, born at Antwerp in 1596, was also a skilful landscape-painter. Died in 1640.

See PILKINGTON'S "Dictionary of Painters."

Hoogvliet, hōg′vleet or hoH′vleet, (ARNOLD,) a popular Dutch poet, born at Vlaardingen in 1687, was educated for a merchant, and held the position of cashier in his native place. His reputation is founded on an epic poem, called "Abraham the Patriarch," (1727,) which was received with extraordinary and durable favour. "No book in Dutch literature," says Marron, "has been honoured with a more decided national adoption." ("Biographie Universelle.") He afterwards published a collection of poems on various subjects, which are not unworthy of his name. Died in 1763.

See JAN VAN KRUYFF, "Leven van A. Hoogvliet," 1782; WILLEM TERPSTRA, "Oratio de A. Hoogvlietio Poeta," 1816.

Hoogzaat, hōg′zȧt, (JAN,) an able Dutch painter, born at Amsterdam in 1664. He decorated the château of Loo for William III. of England. Died in 1712.

Hook, hōōk, (JAMES,) an English composer and musician, born at Norwich in 1746. He was employed as organist at Vauxhall Garden, London, for many years, and composed numerous popular ballads, songs, concertos, etc. Died in 1827.

Hook, (JAMES,) LL.D., an English writer, brother of Theodore E. Hook, was born in London about 1771. He was educated for the church, and in 1825 was appointed Dean of Worcester. His principal works are two novels, called "Pen Owen" and "Percy Mallory." Died in 1828.

Hook, (JAMES CLARKE,) an English painter, born in London, November 21, 1819. In the early part of his career he painted subjects from Italian history and scenes from Shakspeare, but later has executed many marine pieces and scenes from English domestic life. He became an associate of the Royal Academy in 1850, and a full Academician in 1860.

Hook, (THEODORE EDWARD,) born in London in 1788, was the son of James, the musical composer, noticed above. He was an excellent vocalist, an expert mimic, and a prodigy of colloquial power. In 1805 he wrote "The Soldier's Return," an operatic farce, which was very successful. He was addicted to punning, to extravagant dissipation, and to audacious practical jokes. His brilliant wit and marvellous faculty of improvisation rendered him an idol of the gay world, and commended him to the favour of the prince-regent, who procured his appointment in 1812 as treasurer to the colony of Mauritius, with a salary of about £2000. In 1818, a large deficit being found in his treasure-chest, he was sent home charged with peculation. The legal inquiry, however, proved nothing against him except a culpable negligence of his official duties. In 1820 he became editor of the "John Bull" newspaper, which was very successful in a pecuniary respect and obtained great notoriety. Among his most popular works are "Sayings and Doings," (of which he issued three series,) "Maxwell," a novel, and "Gilbert Gurney," a novel, which contains an autobiography of himself. In 1836 he was editor of the "New Monthly Magazine." Died in 1841.

Hook, (WALTER FARQUHAR,) an English theologian, a nephew of the preceding, was born in London in 1798. He became vicar of Leeds in 1837, and Dean of Chichester in 1859. Among his works are "Hear the Church," (28th edition, 1838,) "Ecclesiastical Biography," (8 vols., 1845–52,) "Church Dictionary," (7th edition, 1854,) and "Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury," (9 vols., of which the first volume was published in 1860.) He was noted for his zeal and success in the cause of church extension. Died October 20, 1875.

Hooke, hōōk, (NATHANIEL,) a Roman Catholic historian, born about 1690, was an intimate friend of Pope the poet. His principal work is "The Roman History from the Building of Rome to the End of the Commonwealth," (4 vols. 4to, 1733–71,) which was often reprinted, and is commended as a faithful compilation. He was employed by Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, as editor of her Memoirs, (1742.) Died in 1764.

Hooke, (ROBERT,) M.D., an English philosopher, born at Freshwater, in the Isle of Wight, in 1635, and noted for his inventive faculty, mechanical genius, and scientific acquirements. In 1662 he was chosen curator of experiments to the Royal Society, of which he was a Fellow, and afterwards secretary. About 1666 he became professor of geometry in Gresham College, and city surveyor of London. Among his multifarious accomplishments was skill in architecture, which he exercised in drawing the plan of Bedlam and other public buildings in London. He wrote many memoirs on various branches of natural science. He had a dispute with Hevelius on the subject of the telescope, and attacked Newton's theory of light and colours. He claimed the invention of the barometer, quadrant, balance-spring for watches, etc. Died in 1702.

Hook'ẹr, (HERMAN,) an American Episcopalian divine, born at Poultney, Rutland county, Vermont. He published, among other works, "The Portion of the Soul," etc., (1835,) "The Philosophy of Unbelief in Morals and Religion," and "Uses of Adversity," (1846.) Died in 1857.

See GRISWOLD, "Prose Writers of America."

Hook'ẹr, (hōōk'ẹr,) otherwise called Vŏw'ell, (JOHN,) M.P., an English historian, born at Exeter about 1524, was uncle of Richard Hooker, noticed below. He represented Exeter in Parliament in 1571. He compiled a large part of Holinshed's "Chronicles," (1586,) and wrote a treatise on the order and usage of Parliaments, and a few other works. Died in 1601.

Hook'ẹr, (JOSEPH,) an American general, born in Hadley, Mass., November 13, 1814, graduated at West Point, in 1837. He served as captain in the Mexican war, (1846–47,) and gained the brevet of lieutenant-colonel at Chapultepec. Having resigned his commission about 1853, he lived several years in California. He was appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers about May, 1861, served at the battle of Williamsburg, and in the "seven days' battles" near Richmond, June 26–July 1, 1862. He became a major-general in July, and commanded a corps at the battle of Antietam, September 17, 1862, a few days after which he was promoted to the rank of brigadier-general in the regular army. He commanded a grand division under General Burnside at Fredericksburg in December, 1862, and succeeded Burnside as commander of the army of the Potomac in January, 1863. This army, which probably amounted to 100,000 men or more, engaged the enemy at Chancellorsville, May 2 and 3, and was defeated, but was not pursued. During this battle he was stunned by a cannon-ball. He was relieved of the command on the 28th of June, 1863, and was sent to Tennessee with two corps in September of that year. He contributed to the victory gained by General Grant at Lookout Mountain, November 24 and 25, 1863, and commanded a corps of the army which General Sherman moved from Dalton to Atlanta, May–August, 1864. He had command of the Northern department from September, 1864, to July, 1865. He died October 31, 1879.

Hooker, (JOSEPH DALTON,) F.R.S., an eminent botanist and traveller, a son of Sir William Jackson Hooker, was born in 1817. He studied medicine, and in 1839 sailed as surgeon with the expedition of Sir James Ross to the Antarctic Ocean. On his return he published "Flora Antarctica," (2 vols., 1844–47,) the descriptions and illustrations of which are highly commended. Between 1848 and 1852 he explored the botanical productions of the Himalayas, and published "Himalayan Journals," (2 vols., 1854,) and "Flora Indica." Among his other works are "The Rhododendrons of Sikkim Himalaya," (1851,) a "Flora of New Zealand," (1852–54,) "On the Vegetation of the Carboniferous Period," "The Student's Flora of the British Islands," (1870,) and "The Flora of British India," (1874.)

Hooker, (RICHARD,) an eminent English divine and author, born at Heavytree, near Exeter, in 1553. After graduating at Oxford, he took orders in 1581, and in an unguarded hour married a scolding wife. By the favour of Sandys, Bishop of London, he became Master of the Temple in 1585. Here he was involved in a controversy with Mr. Travers, a Calvinist, who was also a lecturer in the Temple. One of the consequences of this dispute was the production of his great argument for the constitution and discipline of the Anglican Church, entitled "The Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity." After he began this work, desiring a more retired station than the Temple, he obtained in 1591 the rectory of Boscombe, to which the prebend of Salisbury was added. From 1595 until his death he was rector of Bishopsbourne. His work above-named was published from 1594 to 1597. It is regarded as a great bulwark of the Church, a monument of sound learning, and a noble model of literary excellence. According to Hallam, "the finest as well as the most philosophical writer of the Elizabethan period is Hooker. The first book of his 'Ecclesiastical Polity' is at this day one of the master-pieces of English eloquence. . . . So stately and graceful is the march of his periods, so various the fall of his musical cadences upon the ear, so rich in images, so condensed in sentences, so grave and noble his diction, that I know not whether any later writer has more admirably displayed the capacities of our language, or produced passages more worthy of comparison with the splendid monuments of antiquity." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") Died in 1600.

Hooker, (Rev. THOMAS,) one of the founders of Connecticut, was born at Marfield, England, in 1586. After preaching in Holland, he emigrated in 1633 to Boston, Massachusetts, and was the first pastor of Cambridge. In 1636, in company with Samuel Stone, he founded the city of Hartford, where he was minister until his death. He was a very influential man in the churches, and wrote many treatises, among which is the "Application of Redemption." Died in 1647.

See E. W. HOOKER, "Life of Thomas Hooker," 1849.

Hooker, (WILLIAM JACKSON,) F.R.S., a distinguished English botanist, born at Norwich in 1785. He published in 1811 "A Journal of a Tour in Iceland in 1809," and described, with Dr. Taylor, British mosses in "Muscologia Britannica," (1818.) His "Flora Scotica" appeared in 1821. He produced an excellent "Flora Exotica," (3 vols., 1823–27.) For many years he was professor of botany in the University of Glasgow. Among his greatest works are "Icones Filicum," or "Figures and Descriptions of Ferns," (with Dr. Greville, 2 vols., 1829–31,) "Flora Boreali-Americana," (2 vols., 1829–40,) and a "British Flora," (1830; 6th edition, 1850,) which gives a complete description of British plants, arranged after the natural method. He was appointed about 1840 director of the royal gardens at Kew, which have been greatly improved under his superintendence, and are said to surpass all other gardens in the world in the number and variety of the plants. He was the father of Dr. J. D. Hooker, noticed above. Died in 1865.

Hoolâkoo, Houlakou, Hûlâkû, hoo'lä-koo', or Hoolagoo, hoo-lä-goo', sometimes very improperly written Hulakoo, a grandson of Jengis Khan, born in 1217, was the first of the Eel-Khans, (Ilkhans or Ilchans,) or Mongol kings of Persia. He was commanded by his elder brother Mangoo (the father of Kooblai Khan) to complete the conquest of Persia, which he accomplished about the year 1255. He exterminated the Ismaeelians, or Assassins, and afterwards directed his forces against Bagdâd, which he took in February, 1258, and delivered up to pillage and massacre. If we may believe the statements of the Moslem historians, nearly 800,000 persons, including Motassem (the last of the Abbasside caliphs) and his eldest son, perished on that occasion. As a warrior, Hoolâkoo was distinguished for his sanguinary cruelty: he was nevertheless a patron of science, and the celebrated Eel-Khânee (or -Khannee) astronomical tables were prepared under his auspices, and derive their name from his title of Eel-Khân, signifying the prince or chief of the tribe. He died in 1265, and was succeeded by his son, Abâkâ Khan.

Hoole, hōōl, (Rev. CHARLES,) born at Wakefield, England, in 1610, taught school with credit in London, etc., and was afterwards rector of Stock. He wrote a "Latin Grammar," and other school-books. Died in 1666.

Hoole, (ELIJAH,) an English Orientalist and Wesleyan minister, born at Manchester about 1798. He served as a missionary in India, and published "Madras, Mysore, and the South of India." Died in 1872.

Hoole, (JOHN,) an English dramatist and translator, born in London in 1727, was educated in Grub Street. He was a friend of Dr. Johnson, and was a clerk in the East India House about forty years. He wrote several tragedies, and translated into bad or insipid verse the great poems of Tasso and Ariosto. In reference to his version of Tasso, (published in 1763,) Sir Walter Scott called Hoole a "noble transmuter of gold into lead." His "Orlando Furioso" appeared in 5 vols., 1773–83. Died in 1803.

See "Biographia Dramatica."

Hoole, MRS. See HOFLAND, (BARBARA.)

Hoomâyoon or Humâyûn, hōō'mī'yoon', Emperor of Hindostan, of the dynasty of the Great Moguls, was the eldest son of Bâber. He was born at Cabool in 1508, and ascended the throne in 1530. Agra was his capital. He was defeated by the Afghans in 1540. His brothers having rebelled against him, he was driven out of his kingdom, and took refuge at the court of Persia. In 1545 he returned with an army and recovered his throne. He gained decisive victories over the Afghans, under Sekunder Shah, on the Sutlej, in 1554, and at Sirhind in 1555. He died in 1556, and was succeeded by his son, the celebrated Akbăr. He was versed in astronomy, and wrote several poems.

Hoop'er, (GEORGE,) D.D., an English prelate, born at Grimley in 1640, was educated at Oxford, and was an excellent classical and Oriental scholar. In 1677 he was almoner to Mary, Princess of Orange, and in 1691 became chaplain to William and Mary, and Dean of Canterbury. He obtained the bishopric of Saint Asaph in 1703, from which he was afterwards transferred to that of Bath and Wells. He published numerous religious works. Died in 1727.

Hooper or Hoper, (JOHN,) an English reformer and martyr, born in Somersetshire about 1495. While a student at Oxford, he was converted to the Protestant faith. In 1539, to escape the Bloody Statutes of Henry VIII., he retired from England and passed several years at Zurich. At the death of Henry he settled in London, where he became an eminent and eloquent preacher. In 1550 he was made Bishop of Gloucester, and in 1552 received the bishopric of Worcester in commendam. Soon after the accession of Mary he was condemned as a heretic, and, refusing to recant, was burned at the stake in 1553. He wrote numerous theological works.

Hope, (ALEXANDER JAMES BERESFORD,) M.P., an author and connoisseur, son of Thomas Hope, noticed below, was born in London in 1820. Among his works are an essay on "Newspapers and their Writers," "The English Cathedral of the Nineteenth Century," and "Worship in the Church of England." Died in 1887.

Hope, (Rev. FREDERICK WILLIAM,) F.R.S., an English entomologist, born about 1800, wrote "The Coleopterist's Manual." Died in 1862.

Hope, (Sir HENRY,) a British admiral, born in 1787; died in 1863.

Hope, (JAMES,) a British physician of the present century, was physician to Saint George's Hospital, London, and published "Principles and Illustrations of Morbid Anatomy," (1834,) and a "Treatise on Diseases of the Heart and Great Vessels," (1839.) Died about 1840.

Hope, (JOHN,) M.D., F.R.S., a Scottish botanist, born in 1725, was educated at Edinburgh and Paris, and practised in the former city. In 1761 he was appointed king's botanist in Scotland, and superintendent of the royal garden, and in 1786 regius professor of botany in the University of Edinburgh. He commenced a work on botany, which he did not live to finish. Died in 1786.

See ANDREW DUNCAN, "Life of John Hope," 1786.

Hope, (JOHN,) Earl of Hopetoun, a British general, born near Linlithgow in 1766, was a younger son of the second Earl of Hopetoun. After passing through the inferior grades, he was made a colonel in 1796, and returned to Parliament. In 1800 he served as adjutant-general under General Abercrombie in Egypt, and in 1802 obtained the rank of major-general. Having been made lieutenant-general in 1808, he took part in the battle of Corunna, in 1809, and at the death of Sir John Moore succeeded him in the command. He was commander-in-chief in Ireland about 1812. In 1814 he was raised to the peerage, as Baron of Niddry, and at the death of his elder brother, in 1816, inherited his title. Died in 1823.

Hope, (Sir THOMAS,) a Scottish lawyer, born in Edinburgh. He was knighted and appointed king's advocate in 1627, after gaining distinction at the bar. He wrote valuable legal treatises. His father, Henry Hope, was related to the wealthy family of Hope in Amsterdam. Died in 1646.

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen."

Hope, (THOMAS,) an English novelist and miscellaneous writer of rare merit, born about 1770, was a member of the wealthy family of Hope of Amsterdam. After traversing Europe, Asia, and Africa, to gratify his passion for architecture, and retiring from business with an immense fortune, he settled in London, and distinguished himself as a patron of the fine arts. He formed galleries of paintings and statues, and magnificent collections of rare works of art. In 1807 he published a work on "Household Furniture," which produced quite a revolution in upholstery and an improvement in the public taste. Soon after appeared "The Costume of the Ancients," and "Modern Costumes," which evince great antiquarian lore. In 1819 he published, anonymously, "Anastasius; or, Memoirs of a Modern Greek," which was attributed to Byron, and made a vivid sensation by its surprising combination of Oriental romance and classic learning. "Mr. Hope will excuse us," says Sydney Smith, "but we could not help exclaiming, in reading it, 'Is this Mr. Thomas Hope?—is this the man of chairs and tables?—the Œdipus of coal-boxes?—he who meditated on muffineers and planned pokers? Where has he hidden all this eloquence and poetry up to this hour?' The work before us places him in the highest list of eloquent writers and of superior men." Byron said he would have given his two most approved poems to have been the author of "Anastasius." Hope also wrote an "Essay on the Origin and Prospects of Man," and a "Historical Essay on Architecture," (1835,) which was received with favour. He married in 1807 Louisa Beresford, a daughter of W. Beresford, Archbishop of Tuam. Died in 1831.

Hopkins, (EZEKIEL,) an English Calvinistic divine, born at Sandford, Devonshire, in 1633, was a popular preacher, and one of the standard theologians of England. He became Bishop of Raphoe in 1671, and Bishop of Londonderry in 1681. He was driven from this place by the Catholic insurgents in 1688. Among his works (which are admired even by many who are not Calvinists) are a "Treatise on the Vanity of the World," (1663,) "Sermons," (4 vols., 1691–96,) the "Doctrine of the Two Covenants," and "Exposition on the Lord's Prayer," (1692.) His style is remarkable for sententious brevity. Died in 1690.

Hopkins, (JOHN,) an English teacher, who graduated at Oxford in 1544, is chiefly noted for his share in the poetical version of David's Psalms by Sternhold and Hopkins. He is supposed to have been a clergyman.

Hopkins, (JOHN HENRY,) an Episcopal theologian, born in Dublin, Ireland, in 1792, came to the United States in 1800. He became rector of a church at Pittsburg in 1824, and was chosen Bishop of Vermont in 1832. Among his numerous works are "The Primitive Creed Examined and Explained," (1834,) a "Scriptural, Ecclesiastical, and Historical View of Slavery," (1864,) in which work he advocates the Southern view of slavery, and "The Law of Ritualism," (1866.) Died in 1868

Hopkins, (JOHN HENRY,) D.D., an American clergyman, a son of Bishop J. H. Hopkins, already noticed, was born at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, October 28, 1820. He graduated at the University of Vermont in 1839, and at the General Theological Seminary (Episcopal) in 1850, took priest's orders in 1872, founded the "Church Journal," (New York,) and edited the same, 1853–68. He published a "Manual of Matrimony," (1845,) "Carols, Hymns, and Songs," (1863; 3d edition, 1882,) "Canticles Noted," (1866,) "Life of Bishop Hopkins," (1872,) "Poems by the Wayside," (1883,) etc. He also edited the writings of Dr. Milo Mahan, and wrote his memoir.

Hopkins, (JOHNS,) an American philanthropist, born in Anne Arundel county, Maryland, May 19, 1795. He acquired a large fortune as a wholesale grocer of Baltimore. He founded a noble free hospital, a convalescent hospital, a coloured orphanage, and the Johns Hopkins University, endowing these institutions with more than eight millions of dollars. He was a member of the Society of Friends, and lived and died a bachelor. Died at Baltimore, December 24, 1873.

Hopkins, (LEMUEL,) M.D., born at Waterbury, Connecticut, in 1750. He practised medicine at Litchfield from 1776 to 1784, and at Hartford until 1801. He wrote "The Hypocrite's Hope," and other poems. He was associated with Barlow and Trumbull in writing "The Anarchiad," a poem. Died in 1801.

Hopkins, (MARK,) a Presbyterian theologian, born in Stockbridge, Massachusetts, in 1802, graduated at Williams College in 1824. He became professor of moral philosophy in that college in 1830, and was president of the same from 1836 to 1872. He published "Lowell Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," "Miscellaneous Essays and Discourses," (1847,) "Lectures on Moral Philosophy," (1858,) "The Law of Love and Love as a Law, or Christian Ethics," (1869,) "Outline Study of Man," (1873,) and "Strength and Beauty," (1874.) He received the degree of D.D. from Dartmouth College in 1837, and that of LL.D. from the University of New York in 1857. Died June 17, 1887.

Hopkins, (SAMUEL,) an American divine, born at Waterbury, Connecticut, in 1721, is called the founder of the Hopkinsian school. He studied theology under Jonathan Edwards, was ordained a minister in 1743, and began in that year to preach at Housatonnoc, now Great Barrington. In 1769 he removed from that place to Newport, Rhode Island. "Dr. Hopkins," says Allen, "was a very humble, pious, and benevolent man. . . . His life was spent chiefly in meditation; his preaching had but little effect." He published a "System of Doctrines contained in Divine Revelation Explained and Defended," (1793,) and also wrote a "Dialogue against Slavery," (1776,) etc. He forms a prominent character in Mrs. Stowe's "Minister's Wooing." Died in 1803.

Hopkins, (STEPHEN,) an American statesman, born at Scituate, Rhode Island, in 1707, was a farmer in his youth, and afterwards a merchant. He was chief justice of the superior court from 1751 to 1754, and subsequently Governor of Rhode Island. In 1774 he was elected to Congress, and signed the Declaration of Independence in 1776. The unsteadiness of his hand indicated by his signature was occasioned not by fear, but by a nervous affection. He continued in Congress until 1779. Died in 1785.

Hopkins, (Rev. WILLIAM,) a learned antiquary, born at Evesham, England, in 1647, was made prebendary of Worcester in 1675, and vicar of Lindridge in 1686. Died in 1700.

Hopkins, (WILLIAM,) an English Arian writer, born at Monmouth in 1706, became vicar of Bolney in 1731. He wrote a treatise in favour of Arianism, and translated the book of Exodus, (1784.) Died in 1786.

Hop'kin-son, (FRANCIS,) an eminent author, wit, and patriot, born in Philadelphia in 1737. He graduated at the college of his native city, and chose the profession of the law. Having visited England in 1765, and passed two years there, he returned home, settled at Bordentown, and married Miss Ann Borden. From 1774 to 1777 he published "The Pretty Story," "The Prophecy," and the "Political Catechism," three humorous and popular essays, which contributed to foment the spirit of freedom and to prepare the people for national independence. He represented New Jersey in the Continental Congress of 1776, and signed the Declaration of Independence. He was appointed judge of the admiralty of Pennsylvania in 1779, and in 1790 judge of the district court of the United States. Besides the above essays, he wrote the "Battle of the Kegs," a ballad, and other works, in prose and verse. Died in 1791.

See SANDERSON, "Biography of the Signers to the Declaration of Independence;" "National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans," vol. iii.

Hopkinson, (JOSEPH,) LL.D., an American jurist, author of "Hail Columbia," and son of the preceding, was born in Philadelphia in 1770. He was educated at the University of Pennsylvania, studied law, and rose to eminence in his profession in his native city. He was the leading counsel for Dr. Rush in his famous libel suit against William Cobbett in 1799, and was also employed in the trials under the alien and sedition laws before Judge Chase in 1800, and in the impeachment of the latter for alleged misdemeanour in office during these trials, before the United States Senate, in 1805. From 1815 to 1819 he was a representative in Congress, in which he distinguished himself as a speaker, particularly in opposition to the United States Bank, and on the Seminole war. In 1828 he was appointed by President Adams judge of the United States court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, which position he held till his death, in 1842.

Hop'per, (ISAAC TATEM,) a distinguished philanthropist, a member of the Society of Friends, born near Woodbury, New Jersey, in 1771. He resided many years in Philadelphia, but passed the latter part of his life in New York. He was a man of great energy, courage, and intellectual acuteness, and distinguished for his life-long efforts to promote benevolent and humane objects,—especially negro emancipation. In the controversy which resulted in the separation of the Society of Friends in 1827, he was one of the most zealous adherents of the anti-orthodox party. Died in 1852.

See LYDIA M. CHILD, "Life of I. T. Hopper," 1853; "Lives of Eminent Philadelphians," 1859.

Hop'per, (THOMAS,) an English architect, born at Rochester about 1775. After being employed by the prince-regent on Carleton House, he erected many castles and mansions for the nobility, among which Penrhyn Castle is regarded as one of the best. He possessed superior conversational powers, and associated freely with people of distinction. Died in 1856.

Hoppers, hop'pẹrs, or Hopper, hop'pẹr, (JOACHIM,) [Lat. HOPPE'RUS,] a Dutch jurist, born in Friesland in 1523. In 1566 he became privy councillor at Madrid, and chancellor for the affairs of the Netherlands. He was more moderate than the other ministers of Philip II. Among his works is one "On the Legal Art," ("De Juris Arte Libri tres," 1553.) Died in 1576.

See MOTLEY, "Rise of the Dutch Republic," part ii. chap v., and part iv. chap. iv.

Hop'pin, (AUGUSTUS,) an American artist, born in Providence, Rhode Island, in 1828. He pursued a collegiate course at Brown University, and entered upon the profession of law, but subsequently devoted himself to drawing on wood. He has illustrated "The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table," the poem of "Nothing to Wear," and numerous other subjects.

Hoppin, (JAMES MASON,) D.D., an American scholar, born at Providence, Rhode Island, January 17, 1820. He graduated at Yale College in 1840, and studied in the University of Berlin, was professor of homiletics and pastoral theology in Yale College, 1861–79, and in 1879 became professor of the history of art in the same institution. His principal books are "Notes of a Theological Student," (1854,) "Old England," (1867,) "Office and Work of the Christian Ministry," (1869,) "Life of Admiral Foote," (1874,) "Memoirs of Henry Armitt Brown," (1880,) and "Homiletics," (1881.)

Hoppin, (THOMAS F.,) an American painter and designer, brother of Augustus Hoppin, born in Providence,

Rhode Island, in 1816. Among the most important of his designs are the figures on the great window of Trinity Church, New York.

Hopp'nẹr, (JOHN,) R.A., an excellent English portrait-painter, born in London in 1759. He studied in the Royal Academy, and was patronized by the Prince of Wales. For many years he was the most fashionable portrait-painter of London, except Sir Thomas Lawrence. Hoppner was very successful in portraits of women. His colouring is natural and powerful, and his tones are mellow and deep. His works have a charming air of facility and negligence. Died in 1810.

See CUNNINGHAM, "Lives of Painters," etc.

Hop'tọn, (ARTHUR,) a learned English mathematician, born in Somersetshire in 1588, was intimate with Selden. He wrote "Speculum Topographicum," (1611,) and a few other works. Died in 1614.

Hopton, (Sir RALPH,) an English royalist officer, who fought for Charles I. in the civil war. He obtained some success in Cornwall in 1643. In 1646 he commanded about 8000 men at the battle of Torrington, where he was defeated by Fairfax. Died about 1652.

Hopton, (SUSANNA,) an English authoress, born in 1627, wrote "Hexameron, or Meditations on the Six Days of Creation." Died in 1709.

Horace, hŏr'ạss, [Lat. HORA'TIUS; Fr. HORACE, o'rȧss'; Ger. HORAZ, ho-rȧts'; It. ORAZIO, o-rȧt'se-o,] or, more fully, Quin'tus Hora'tius Flac'cus, an excellent and popular Latin poet, born at Venusia, (now Venosa,) in Italy, in December, 65 B.C. His father was a freedman, who gained a competence as a coactor, (collector of indirect taxes or of the proceeds of auctions,) and purchased a farm near Venusia, on the bank of the Aufidus, (Ofanto.) At an early age he was sent to Rome, and became a pupil of the noted teacher Orbilius Pupillus, with whom he learned grammar and the Greek language.

About his eighteenth year, he went to prosecute his studies in the groves of the Academy at Athens,—then the principal seat of learning and philosophy,—where he remained until the death of Julius Cæsar (in 44 B.C.) involved the empire in a civil war. As Brutus passed through Athens, Horace, with patriotic ardour, joined his army, was made a military tribune, took command of a legion, and witnessed the fatal defeat of the cause at Philippi, where he threw away his shield. (Carmina, ii. 7.) His estate having been confiscated, he went to Rome, where he supported himself a short time by acting as clerk in the treasury. His early poems having excited the interest of Virgil and Varius, they recommended him to Mæcenas, in whom he found a liberal patron and intimate friend. Thenceforth his life was eminently prosperous, and serenely passed in congenial studies and patrician society. Preferring independence to the tempting prizes of ambition, he refused the office of private secretary to Augustus, who treated him with particular favour. He had a true relish for rural pleasures and the charms of nature, which he often enjoyed at his Sabine farm or his villa in Tibur. Died in November, 8 B.C. He was never married. He was of short stature, and had dark eyes and hair. His character, as deduced from his writings, is well balanced, and unites in a high degree good sense, good nature, urbanity, and elegant taste. His poems, consisting of odes, satires, and epistles, may all be contained in one small volume. His chief merits are a calm philosophy, a graceful diction, an admirable sense of propriety, and a keen insight into human nature, which have attracted an admiration growing from age to age, and have rendered him, next to Virgil, the most illustrious poet of ancient Rome. "It is mainly," says "Blackwood's Magazine" for April, 1868, "to this large and many-sided nature of the man himself that Horace owes his unrivalled popularity,—a popularity which has indeed both widened and deepened in its degree in proportion to the increase of modern civilization." His "Epistles" are among the few poems which represent the most perfect and original form of Latin verse. There is no very good English translation of Horace's entire works: that of Francis (4 vols., 1747) is perhaps the best. Lord Lytton's translation of the Odes (1869) is highly praised.

Horæ, ho'ree, [Gr. Ὧραι; Fr. HEURES, ur, or HORES, or,] the Hours or Seasons, which the ancients imagined to have charge of the gates of heaven or doors of Olympus. They appear to have been originally personifications of the order of nature and of the seasons. They were also regarded as goddesses of justice, peace, and order. Milton associates them with the Graces:

> "while universal Pan,
> Knit with the Graces and the Hours in dance,
> Led on the eternal Spring."

Horn or Horne, (CHARLES EDWARD,) born in London in 1786, was noted as a composer of music. He was the author of "The Deep, Deep Sea," and other popular songs. He died in Boston, Massachusetts, in 1850.

Horn, hŏrn, (FRANZ CHRISTOPH,) a German critic, born at Brunswick in 1781. He published several novels, a "Critical History of German Poetry and Eloquence," (4 vols., 1822–29,) and "The Dramatic Works of Shakspeare," ("Shakespeare's Schauspiele," 5 vols., 1823–31.) Died in 1837.

See "Franz Horn: biographisches Denkmal," Leipsic, 1839.

Horn, hŏrn, (FREDRICK,) Count of Aminne, a Swedish general in the French service, born at Husby in 1725. As aide-de-camp of Marshal D'Estrées, he had an important part in the victory of Hastenbeck, (1757.) He obtained the rank of lieutenant-general in the Swedish army in 1778. Died in 1796.

His son, COUNT HORN, was an accomplice in the assassination of Gustavus III. in 1792, for which he was banished for life. Died in 1823.

Horn, [Lat. HOR'NIUS,] (GEORG,) a German historian, born at Greussen in 1620. He became professor of history at Leyden about 1648, and wrote, in Latin, works on history and geography, among which are an "Ecclesiastical and Political History," (1665,) and "Noah's Ark, or a History of the World," (1666.) Died in 1670.

See JOHANN ADAM FLESSA, "Dissertatio de Vita G. Hornii," 1738.

Horn, (GUSTAF,) COUNT OF, an able Swedish general, born in Upland in 1592. Having served with credit in Poland and Livonia, he was appointed a senator about 1624. At the battle of Leipsic, in 1631, he commanded the left wing, and contributed to the victory. After Gustavus Adolphus was killed at Lützen, Horn gained some advantages over the enemy, but was taken prisoner at Nordlingen in 1634. Restored to liberty in 1642, he was made commander-in-chief of the Swedish army in the war against Denmark, in which he was successful. The queen rewarded him (about 1652) with the office of Constable of Sweden and the title of count. Died in 1657.

Horn'blō̄w-ẹr, (JOSEPH C.,) an American jurist, born at Belleville, New Jersey, in 1777. He was chief justice of the supreme court of New Jersey from 1832 to 1846. He decided in 1856 that Congress had no right to pass a law for the rendition of fugitive slaves. Died at Newark in June, 1864.

Horne, horn, (GEORGE,) D.D., an English bishop and author, born at Otham, in Kent, in 1730, was a good Hebrew scholar. He was chosen vice-chancellor of Oxford in 1776, Dean of Canterbury in 1781, and Bishop of Norwich in 1790. He wrote against the philosophy of Newton, and published treatises in favour of John Hutchinson, and other works on theology. His "Commentary on the Book of Psalms" (2 vols., 1771) is esteemed an excellent performance, and has often been reprinted. He was a friend of Dr. Samuel Johnson. Died in 1792.

See WILLIAM JONES, "Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the Rev. G. Horne," 1795.

Horne, (RICHARD HENGIST,) an English poet and dramatist, born in London about 1803. He produced, besides other dramas, a tragedy entitled "Gregory the Seventh," (1840.) His reputation is founded on "Orion, an Epic Poem," (1843,) which was announced at the price of one farthing, as a sarcasm upon the low estimation into which epic poetry had fallen. After three editions had been sold, the price was raised to one shilling, and finally to five shillings. Among his other works are "The New Spirit of the Age," (2 vols., 1844,) and "Ballads and Romances," (1846.) From 1852 to about 1870 he lived in Australia. Died March 13, 1884.

Horne, (THOMAS HARTWELL,) D.D., an eminent English author, born in 1780, was educated in London. He passed eight years in the labour of a barrister's clerk, and acquired some knowledge of law, while his leisure was diligently improved in literary studies. In 1818 he published his principal work, the "Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures," (3 vols., 1818; 10th edition, enlarged, 1856,) which is considered the most complete and valuable work on that subject, and was soon adopted as a class-book in all the universities and colleges of England and in some of those in the United States. Having no sectarian tendency, it is appreciated by Christians generally, and has conduced greatly to the diffusion of sound biblical literature. In 1819 Horne was ordained by the Bishop of London, and obtained a prebend in Saint Paul's Cathedral, besides other livings. Among his other numerous publications are "Deism Refuted," (1819,) and a "Manual of Biblical Bibliography," (1839.) Died January 27, 1862.

Horneck, hor'nĕk, (ANTHONY,) D.D., was born at Bacharach, in Germany, in 1641, removed to England about 1660, and became prebendary of Exeter, Westminster, and Wells. He wrote many devout religious works, among which are "The Great Law of Consideration," (1677; 11th edition, 1729,) and "The Happy Ascetic," (1681.) His writings were commended by Doddridge as "exceedingly pathetic and elegant." Died in 1696.

See his Life, by BISHOP KIDDER.

Horneck, von, fon hor'nĕk, (OTTOKAR,) called also OTTOKAR von Steiermark, (stī'ẹr-mark',) one of the earliest who wrote in the German language, was the author of a "History of the Great Empires of the World to the Death of Frederick II.," (1280,) and a chronicle in rhyme. It has been published in Petz's "Austrian Historians," and is valued for its interesting account of the manners and customs of that age.

Horneman, hor'nẹh-măn', (Jens Wilken,) a Danish botanist, born at Marstal in 1770, became professor of botany at Copenhagen in 1808. He continued the "Flora Danica," a magnificent work, which other naturalists commenced, and which appeared in 14 vols. folio, (1806–40.) He wrote "Economical Botany for Denmark," (1798,) and other works. Died in 1841.

See his Autobiography; Erslew, "Forfatter-Lexicon."

Hornemann, hor'nẹh-măn', (Friedrich Conrad,) a German traveller, born at Hildesheim in 1772, attempted in 1797 to explore Northern and Central Africa He left Moorzook with a caravan bound for Bornoo in April, 1800, after which date he was never heard from.

Hor'nẹr, (Francis,) an eminent British statesman and lawyer, born in Edinburgh in 1778, was educated in the university of that city, and studied law with his friend Henry Brougham. Having removed to London in 1803, he was welcomed by the leading Whigs, such as Fox, Mackintosh, and Romilly, who hastened to enlist his eminent abilities in the public service. In 1806 he was returned to Parliament for Saint Ives. The death of Fox having produced a change of ministry and a dissolution of the House, Horner was returned for Wendover in 1807. He acquired great influence in Parliament by his integrity, wisdom, liberality, and knowledge of political economy. In 1810 he was a member of the Bullion committee and author of a part of the "Bullion Report," and made an able speech on that question. In 1813–14 he was recognized as one of the leaders of his party, and in 1816 he made a speech on Catholic claims, which was his last speech in the House. Compelled by ill health to retire from business, he set out on a journey to the south of Europe, and died, greatly lamented, at Pisa, in 1817. He was one of the originators of the "Edinburgh Review," for which he wrote numerous articles. "He died at the age of thirty-eight," says Lord Cockburn, "possessed of greater public influence than any other private man." "No eminent speaker of Parliament," says Sir J. Mackintosh, "owed so much of his success to his moral character. His high place was therefore honourable to his audience and to his country."

See "Memoirs and Correspondence of F. Horner," published by his brother, Leonard Horner, in 1843; Chambers, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen;" "Edinburgh Review" for October, 1843; "Quarterly Review" for May, 1843.

Horner, (Leonard,) F.R.S., a British geologist, and younger brother of the preceding, took a prominent part in the organization of the London University, of which he was appointed warden in 1827. About 1833 he became inspector of factories, in which capacity he contributed largely to the moral and physical improvement of the operatives. He wrote articles on the "Mineral Kingdom" for the "Penny Magazine," "On the Employment of Children in Factories," (1840,) and other short works. Died in 1864.

Hor'nẹr, (William E.,) an American anatomist, born in Virginia about 1790, became in 1816 demonstrator of anatomy to Dr. Wistar, of the University of Pennsylvania, and in 1831 succeeded Dr. Physick as professor of anatomy in that institution. Died in 1853. (See Wistar, Caspar.)

Horrebow or Horreboe, hor'ṛẹh-bo, (Christoffer,) a Danish astronomer, born at Copenhagen in 1718. He succeeded his father as professor of astronomy about 1750, and published, besides other works, a Latin treatise "On the Annual Parallax of the Fixed Stars," (1747.) Died in 1776.

See Kraft og Nyerup, "Litteraturlexicon."

Horrebow, (Nikolaus,) a Danish author, born at Copenhagen in 1712, became a judge of the supreme court. In 1750 he was sent by government to explore Iceland, of which he wrote a description, said to be very correct. Died in 1750.

See Kraft og Nyerup, "Litteraturlexicon."

Horrebow or Horreboe, (Peder,) an eminent Danish astronomer, the father of Christoffer, noticed above, was born in Jutland in 1679. He became professor of astronomy at Copenhagen in 1710. He determined the parallax of the sun more exactly in his "Clavis Astronomiæ," a treatise on physical astronomy, in which he favours the theory of Descartes. He wrote other works, among which is "Copernicus Triumphans, sive de Parallaxi Orbis Annui," (1727.) Died in 1764.

See Kraft og Nyerup, "Litteraturlexicon;" Nyerup, "Universitaets Annalen."

Horrebow, (Peder,) a son of the preceding, born in 1728, observed the transit of Venus in 1761, and wrote an account of it. Died in 1812.

Hor'ṛọcks or Hor'ṛọx, (Jeremiah,) a distinguished English astronomer, born at Toxteth, near Liverpool, in 1619, was educated at Cambridge, took orders, and became curate of Hoole. He was the author of the true theory of lunar motion, and was the first who observed the transit of Venus, (in 1639,) which he had successfully foretold, and of which he wrote an account, entitled "Venus sub Sole visa." His other works on astronomy were published by Dr. Wallis in 1672. "His investigations," says the "Edinburgh Review" for October, 1843, "are all stamped with the clear indications of a genius of the first order; and he doubtless would have achieved far greater discoveries had not his privations and successes, his toils and triumphs, been together cut short by his premature death, in 1641."

Hors'field or Horsefield, (Thomas,) M.D., F.R.S., an eminent naturalist and traveller, born in Pennsylvania in 1773. He explored the natural history of Java for many years, and returned to England about 1820. He published "Zoological Researches in Java," etc., (1821–24.) The plants which he collected were described in an excellent work entitled "Plantæ Javanicæ Rariores," (1838–52, with fifty coloured engravings,) in which he was aided by Robert Brown and J. J. Bennett. He also wrote several smaller works. Died in London in 1859.

Hors'ley, (Charles,) an English composer, born at Kensington in 1821. He composed oratorios entitled "David" and "Joseph," (1852.) Died in New York, March 2, 1876.

Horsley, (John,) F.R.S., an eminent British antiquary, born in Mid-Lothian in 1685, became pastor of a dissenting church at Morpeth. He wrote an excellent work entitled "The Roman Antiquities of Britain," ("Britannia Romana," 1732.) Died in 1731.

See Rev. J. Hodgson, "Memoirs of the Life, etc. of John Horsley," London, 1831; Chambers, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen;" Nichols, "Literary Anecdotes."

Horsley, (John Callcott,) an English historical painter, born in London in 1817. His cartoon of "Saint Augustine Preaching" (1843) received one of the prizes of £200 from the Commission of Fine Arts. He was one of the artists commissioned to adorn the House of Lords, in which he painted a fresco of the "Spirit of Religion," (1845.) Among his master-pieces are "L'Allegro and Il Penseroso," (1851,) "Lady Jane Grey and Roger Ascham," (1853,) and a "Scene from Don Quixote," (1855.)

Horsley, (Samuel,) LL.D., an eminent English bishop and writer, born in London in 1733, was educated at Cambridge. In 1759 he obtained the rectory of Newington Butts, and, after receiving other preferments, became Bishop of Saint David's in 1788, of Rochester in 1793, and of Saint Asaph in 1802. To superior talents he joined profound learning, both classical and scientific.

He was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1767, and secretary of the same in 1773. In 1783 he gained distinction by a controversy with Dr. Priestley on Unitarianism, in which it is usually conceded that Horsley had the advantage. He published in 1796 an excellent treatise "On the Prosodies of the Greek and Latin Languages," and "Critical Disquisitions on the Eighteenth Chapter of Isaiah." Among his numerous publications are sermons, treatises on mathematics, and several admired performances in biblical criticism. Died in 1806.

Hort or Horte, (JOSIAH,) an English theologian, educated at a dissenting academy with Dr. Watts, who expressed a high opinion of him. He became Bishop of Kilmore and Ardagh in 1727, and Archbishop of Tuam in 1742. A collection of his sermons was published. He died at an advanced age in 1751.

Hortemels, ĥôr'tẹh-mĕls' or ĥôrt'mĕl', (FRÉDÉRIC,) a French engraver, born at Paris about 1688.

Hortemels, (MARIE MADELEINE,) an able engraver, born in Paris about 1688, was the wife of the celebrated engraver Nicolas Cochin. Died in 1777.

Hortense Eugénie de Beauharnais, ôr'tôNss' ŭ'zhä'ne' dẹh bō'ȧR'nȧ', Queen of Holland, and mother of the emperor Napoleon III., was born in Paris in 1783. She was the daughter of Alexandre, Vicomte de Beauharnais, and Josephine Tascher, afterwards Empress of France. Her personal charms and amiable character rendered her a favourite with Napoleon and the ornament of his court. Against her own inclination, and through the influence of her mother, she became in 1802 the wife of Louis Bonaparte, with whom she did not live happily. It is said that she wept abundantly at the performance of the ceremony. In 1806 her consort Louis was made King of Holland. On this occasion Hortense said she would have preferred the throne of Naples. "I would have rekindled," said she, "the flame of the fine arts in Italy." She disliked the Dutch fogs, and deemed sunshine and Parisian society indispensable blessings.

Hortense was the mother of three sons, whom by the edicts of 1804 and 1805 the emperor had preferred as successors to his crown: 1. NAPOLEON LOUIS CHARLES, who died in 1807; 2. NAPOLEON LOUIS, who died at Pésaro in 1831; 3. CHARLES LOUIS NAPOLEON, the late Emperor of France. In 1810 Louis abdicated his throne, and was separated from his wife, who, with her sons, returned to Paris. At the restoration of 1814 she was created Duchess of Saint-Leu, through the favour of some of the allied powers. Louis XVIII., after an interview with her, declared he had never seen a woman who united so much grace and dignity. After sharing the brief and brilliant triumphs of the Hundred Days, she was compelled to fly from France. The authorities of Geneva refused her an asylum; but she received a hospitable offer from the canton of Thurgau, where she purchased the castle of Arenenberg in 1817. For many years she passed the summer at this place and the winter at Rome. When Louis Napoleon was exiled to the United States, in 1836, she wished to go with him, but had not sufficient strength to bear the voyage; and she died in 1837, in the arms of her son, who, learning her illness, had returned home. We should not omit to mention that she excelled in music, and composed the popular air of "Partant pour la Syrie," one of the favourite national songs of France.

Hor-tĕn'sĭ-us, (LAMBERT,) a Dutch philologist, born at Montfort about 1500. He wrote "On the German War," ("De Bello Germanico," 1560,) and annotations on Virgil's "Æneid," (1567.) Died about 1575.

Hortensius, hor-ten'she-us, (QUINTUS,) an eminent Roman orator, born of an equestrian family in 114 B.C. At an early age he acquired celebrity in the Forum, where, a few years afterwards, he maintained a spirited and generous rivalry with Cicero, who applauds his eloquence and calls him his friend. After serving in the army of Sulla in Asia, he became successively quæstor, ædile, prætor, and, in 69 B.C., consul. In the previous year he was counsel for Verres, when Cicero made his memorable speech for the prosecution. His orations and other works are all lost. His eloquence is said to have been ornate, flowery, Oriental in exuberance, and enlivened with sententious and brilliant passages. He had a retentive memory, a sonorous voice, and a graceful gesture. Died in 50 B.C.

Horvát, hor'vȧt, (ISTVÁN, or STEPHEN,) called "the Hungarian Varro," was born at Stuhlweissenberg in 1784. He wrote "Primitive Magyar Families," (1820, a monumental work,) and various histories. Died in 1846.

Horváth, hor'vȧt, (MICHAEL,) a Hungarian historian, born at Szentes in 1809. He became Bishop of Csanad in 1848, and minister of public instruction in 1849. After the defeat of the patriotic cause he went into exile in 1849. He wrote a valuable "History of the Magyars," (4 vols., 1842–46.) Died Aug. 19, 1878.

Hos'ack, (DAVID,) LL.D., F.R.S., an eminent American physician, born in New York City in 1769. After graduating in Philadelphia in 1791, and prosecuting his studies in Edinburgh and London, he returned to New York, and became professor of botany and materia medica in Columbia College in 1795. He taught clinical medicine and obstetrics in the College of Physicians and Surgeons nearly twenty years, between 1807 and 1826. For many years he was one of the most successful practitioners and most influential citizens of New York. From 1820 to 1828 he was president of the New York Historical Society. His first wife was the sister of Thomas Eddy, and his second the widow of Henry A. Costar. He wrote a treatise on Vision, published by the Royal Society of London, (1794,) "Memoirs of De Witt Clinton," (1829,) a "System of Practical Nosology," (1829,) "Lectures on the Theory and Practice of Physic," (1838,) several volumes of medical essays, and other works. Ho-se'a or O-se'a, [Heb. הוֹשֵׁעַ; Fr. OSÉE, o'zā',] one of the twelve minor Hebrew prophets, of whom little is known, except that he lived in the "days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, Kings of Judah." It is inferred that his prophetic career extended from about 785 to 725 B.C. His language is remarkably obscure. "He is the most difficult and perplexed of all the prophets," says Lowth. He is quoted in Matthew ii. 15, ix. 13, Romans ix. 25, (where his name is written Osee,) and Revelation vi. 16.

Hosemann, ho'zĕh-mân, (THEODOR,) a German genre painter and illustrator, born at Brandenburg, September 24, 1807; died at Berlin, October 15, 1875.

Ho-she'a or Ho-se'a, [Heb. הוֹשֵׁעַ,] the last King of Israel, began to reign about 730 B.C., after he had assassinated King Pekah. (See II. Kings xv. 30 and xvii. 1 to 7.) After a reign of nine years, his capital, Samaria, was taken by Shalmaneser, King of Assyria, who carried Hoshea with his subjects as captives to Halah, Habor, and the cities of the Medes. Since this event the fate of the ten tribes has been involved in mystery.

Hotman, ḣot'mŏn', (ANTOINE,) a French jurist, a brother of François, noticed below, was born about 1525; died in 1596.

Hotman or Hottomann, [Lat. HOTOMAN'NUS and HOTTOMAN'NUS,] (FRANÇOIS,) an eminent French jurist and Protestant, born in Paris in 1524, was a friend of Calvin. He was deeply versed in jurisprudence, literature, and antiquities. He became professor of law at Strasburg about 1550, and at Valence in 1561. By concealment he escaped the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew, (1572,) after which he retired to Geneva and Bâle. He was appointed councillor of state by Henry IV. about 1580. He performed an important part in the scientific revolution which was produced in jurisprudence in the sixteenth century. His famous work on public French law, entitled "Treatise on the Government of the Kings of Gaul," ("Franco-Gallia, sive Tractatus de Regimine Regum Galliæ," 1573,) had an immense influence. He wrote, in elegant Latin, many other works, among which are a "Commentary on Legal Words," ("Commentarius de Verbis Juris," 1558,) and "Celebrated Questions," ("Quæstiones illustres," 1573.) Died at Bâle in 1590. His son JEAN (1552–1636) was a diplomatist and writer.

Hottinger, hot'ting-ẹr, (JOHANN HEINRICH,) an eminent Swiss Orientalist and Protestant divine, born at Zurich in 1620. After studying in his native city, at Geneva, and Leyden, and becoming one of the best Oriental scholars of his time, he was chosen in 1648 professor of theology and Oriental languages at Zurich. In 1655 he accepted the chair of Oriental languages at Heidelberg, where he remained until 1661, when he was elected rector of the University of Zurich. The University of Leyden persuaded him to accept their chair of theology; but before he arrived at that scene of labour he was accidentally drowned, in 1667. Among the numerous monuments of his vast erudition, the following are, perhaps, the principal: "Oriental History," ("Historia Orientalis," 1651,) "Ecclesiastical History of the New Testament," (9 vols., 1651–67,) and "Etymologicum Orientale," a lexicon of seven languages, (1661.)

See J. H. HEIDEGGER, "Historia Vitæ J. H. Hottingeri," 1667; BAYLE, "Historical and Critical Dictionary;" G. H. HAHN, "Untersuchung ob des gelehrten Hottinger's wirkliche Lebensgefahr," etc., 1742; NICÉRON, "Mémoires."

Hottinger, (JOHANN JAKOB,) a Swiss theologian, a son of the preceding, was born at Zurich in 1652. From 1698 until his death he was professor of theology in his native city. He wrote, besides other works, an "Ecclesiastical History of Switzerland," in German, (4 vols., 1708–29.) Died in 1735.

Houdon, oo'dŏn',* (JEAN ANTOINE,) an eminent French sculptor, born at Versailles in 1741. About 1760 he won the grand prize for sculpture at the Academy, and went to Rome with a pension. After remaining there ten years, during which he executed an admired statue of Saint Bruno, he returned to Paris, and was admitted into the Royal Academy in 1775. About 1785 he received from Dr. Franklin a commission to execute the marble statue of Washington which adorns the State-House at Richmond, Virginia. He came to Philadelphia to obtain the model of this work. His reputation was increased by his statues of Voltaire and Cicero, and his busts of Rousseau, Buffon, Franklin, D'Alembert, Napoleon, Ney, etc. His heads of young girls are highly successful in the expression of modesty and innocence. Houdon was a member of the Institute. His personal character was amiable and estimable. Died in 1828.

He is author and editor of many books and pamphlets on local, colonial, and Revolutionary history and biography, of several guide-books, and published the "New York State Gazetteer," (1872,) besides several volumes and reports on meteorology and on vital statistics. He wrote also "Elements of Forestry," (1882,) etc. Died June 11, 1885.

Hough, hŭf, (JOHN,) D.D., an English scholar, born in Middlesex in 1651, was elected president of Magdalene College, Oxford, in 1687, in opposition to the illegal dictation of James II. The king then sent a mandate to the Fellows to elect Parker, a Catholic. In this contest Hough firmly maintained his rights and those of the college, and the king's agents broke open the door in order to place Parker in the president's chair. In 1688 Hough was reinstated, and in 1690 was made Bishop of Oxford. Translated to the see of Lichfield and Coventry in 1699, he refused the Archbishopric of Canterbury in 1715, and became Bishop of Worcester in 1717. He was eminent for piety and learning. Houssaye, hoo'sā', (ARSÈNE,) a successful French littérateur and poet, born near Laon in 1815. He produced "La Couronne des Bluets," (1836,) and many other novels. His "History of Flemish and Dutch Painting" (1846) was received with favour. In 1844 he published a "Gallery of Portraits of the Eighteenth Century," (1st series, 2 vols.,) which was completed in 5 vols. about 1850. From 1849 to 1856 he was director of the Théâtre Français. He also wrote able critiques on art, and published a volume of poems, "Poésies complètes," (1849,) and "Le Roi Voltaire," (1858.) He was chosen inspector-general of the works of art and Musées in 1856, and subsequently produced "Histoire de l'Art Française," (1860,) "Nos grandes Dames," (1868,) "Lucie; Histoire d'une Fille perdue," (1875,) "Les trois Duchesses," (1877,) "La Robe de la Mariée," (1879,) etc.

Houston, hū'stŏn, ? (GEORGE SMITH,) an American Democratic politician, born in Tennessee in 1811. He studied law, which he practised at Huntsville, Alabama, and was elected a member of Congress in 1841. He was chairman of the committee of ways and means in the lower House, 1851–55. Died December 31, 1879.

Houston, hū'stŏn, (SAM*) an American general, born near Lexington, Virginia, in 1793, was taken to Tennessee in his childhood. He studied law, which he practised at Nashville, was elected a member of Congress in 1823, and Governor of Tennessee in 1827. In 1829 he resigned his office, and, renouncing civilized society, passed several years with the Cherokee Indians, who lived west of Arkansas. About the end of 1832 he emigrated to Texas, where he took an active part in the ensuing revolt against the Mexican government. Having been chosen commander-in-chief of the Texan army, he defeated and captured Santa Anna at San Jacinto, April 21, 1836. He was elected President of Texas in July, 1836, and re-elected for a term of three years in 1841. After the annexation of Texas to the Union, (1845,) he was chosen a United States Senator, and at the end of his term in 1853 was elected for a second term. He made an able speech against the Kansas-Nebraska bill in March, 1854, about which time he joined the American (Know-Nothing) party. He was chosen Governor of Texas in 1859. On the breaking out of the civil war he favoured the Union, but was overborne by a large majority of the people. Died July 26, 1863.

Hous'ton, (WILLIAM,) F.R.S., an English surgeon and naturalist, born about 1695, studied under Boerhaave, at Leyden, in 1728–29, and made there, with Van Swieten, experiments respecting the respiration of animals. About 1732 he made a voyage for scientific purposes to the West Indies, where he died in 1733, after collecting and describing many rare plants. The results of his botanical labours were published by Sir Joseph Banks.

See "Biographie Médicale."

Houteville or Houtteville, hoot'vĕl', (CLAUDE FRANÇOIS,) a French priest of the Oratory, born in Paris in 1686. He published, in 1722, "The Truth of the Christian Religion proved by Facts," which attracted much attention and hostile criticism. In 1723 he was chosen a member of the French Academy. He was elected perpetual secretary of the Academy in 1742, and died in the same year.

Houtman, hŏwt'măn, (CORNELIS,) a Dutch navigator, born at Gouda, was the pioneer or founder of the commerce between Holland and the East Indies. As agent of a company, he made the first voyage in 1595, and returned home in 1597. In 1598 he renewed the enterprise with two ships, and landed at Acheen, in Sumatra, where he was arrested with some of his men, and kept a prisoner several years, until his death. Died about 1605.

Houtman, (FREDERIK,) a navigator, born about 1570, was a brother of the preceding, whom he accompanied in his voyage to the East Indies in 1598. He was afterwards Governor of Amboyna, and published a "Malay Dictionary," (1603.) Died about 1613.

Houtteville. See HOUTEVILLE.

Houwaert, hŏw'wärt, (JEAN BAPTISTA,) a Flemish writer and politician, born in 1533. He wrote in a curious mixture of Flemish and Burgundian, with many Latin words and idioms. His works include several dramas on classical subjects, and the remarkable didactic poem "Pegasides Pleyn," called also "The Palace of Maidens," which discusses the varieties of love. Died in 1599.

Hove, van, văn ho'vĕh, (ANTOON,) a Dutch historian and Latin poet, born about 1505; died in 1568.

Hoveden, hŭv'dĕn or hōv'dĕn, de, (ROGER,) an English historian, born at York, lived about 1170–1200. He was professor of theology at Oxford, and filled responsible offices at the court of Henry II. He wrote, in Latin, a "History of England from 731 to 1202," which is commended by Leland, Selden, and others for its fidelity.

be sounded in any case; others maintain that in certain words and names it should be slightly sounded, while in others it is entirely mute. Respecting this subject, see the remarks on French pronunciation in the Introduction.

* So called by himself.

Ho'ven-den, (THOMAS,) an artist, born at Dunmanway, county of Cork, Ireland, December 20, 1840. He studied art in the Cork School of Design and in the New York National Academy. In 1881 he was elected an associate, and in 1882 a full member of the National Academy. He resides in Philadelphia. Among his best works are "In Hoc Signo Vinces," (1880,) "Elaine," (1882,) "A Breton Interior," and "The Last Moments of John Brown," (1884.)

Hovey, hŭv'e, (ALVAH,) an American divine and author, born in Chenango county, New York, about 1820. He graduated at Dartmouth in 1843, and about 1850 became a professor in the Baptist Theological Seminary at Newton. He wrote "Life and Times of Backus," (1857.)

Hovey, (ALVAN P.,) an American statesman and soldier, entered the military service from Indiana in 1861, became a brigadier-general in 1862, and commanded a division at Champion's Hill, May 16, 1863. He was minister to Peru from 1865 to 1870, and governor of Indiana from 1888 till his death, November 23, 1891.

Hovey, (CHARLES EDWARD,) an American officer, born at Hartford, Vermont, in 1827, removed to Illinois, and was made a brigadier-general of volunteers in 1862.

Hŏw, (WILLIAM,) M.D., born in London in 1619, became a captain in the royal army in the civil war, and afterwards practised medicine in his native city. He is said to have been the author of the first English Flora, ("Phytologia Britannica," 1650,) which contains twelve hundred and twenty plants. Died in 1656.

Hŏw'ard, the name of an ancient and noble family of England, the head of which is the Duke of Norfolk and the premier peer of Great Britain. The Earls of Carlisle and Suffolk also belong to the Howard family.

Howard, (ANNE,) daughter of Charles, Earl of Carlisle, was married to Richard, Viscount Irwin. She wrote a "Poetical Essay on Pope's Characters of Women," and other poems. Died in 1760.

Hŏw'ard, (BLANCHE WILLIS,) an American authoress, born at Bangor, Maine, July 21, 1847. In 1875 she removed to Germany, and edited a magazine in English at Stuttgart. Her principal works are the novels "One Summer," (1875,) "One Year Abroad," "Aunt Serena," and "Guenn," (1883,) all of which were remarkably successful.

Howard, (CHARLES,) Lord Effingham, or Lord Howard of Effingham, an English admiral, born in 1536, was the son of William, Lord Effingham, and grandson of Thomas Howard, second Duke of Norfolk. After important civil and military services, he was appointed in 1585 lord high admiral by Queen Elizabeth, and successfully opposed the Invincible Armada in 1588. In 1596 he was associated with the Earl of Essex in the victorious expedition against Cadiz, and was rewarded with the title of Earl of Nottingham. About three years later, when another Spanish invasion was expected, the sole command of the army and navy for a short time was committed to him, with the title of lieutenant-general of England. He retained his honours and offices under James I. Died in 1624.

See CAMPBELL, "Lives of British Admirals;" J. BARROW, "Memoirs of the Naval Worthies of Queen Elizabeth's Reign," 1845.

Howard, (CHARLES,) Earl of Carlisle, born about 1630, was employed in the reign of Charles II. in diplomatic missions to Muscovy, Sweden, and Denmark, of which an account was published in 1669. Died in 1686.

Howard, (CHARLES,) tenth Duke of Norfolk, (previously Hon. CHARLES HOWARD, of Greystock Castle, Cumberland,) succeeded to the dukedom in 1777. He published "Thoughts, Essays, and Maxims, chiefly Religious and Political," (1768,) and "Historical Anecdotes of some of the Howard Family." Died in 1786.

Howard, (CHARLES,) eleventh Duke of Norfolk, an English nobleman, born in 1746, was the son of the tenth Duke. In 1780, being then styled the Earl of Surrey, he exchanged the Catholic faith for that of the Anglican Church. Representing Carlisle in Parliament, he acted with the opposition during the ministries of Lord North and Lord Shelburne. At the death of his father, in 1786, he became Duke of Norfolk. As a member of the House of Lords, he opposed the measures of Pitt. Died in 1815.

Howard, (Hon. EDWARD,) an English writer, a son of Thomas, Earl of Berkshire, lived about 1650. He wrote several unsuccessful dramas, and "The British Princes; a Heroic Poem," in which occur these lines, often quoted in ridicule:

> "A painted vest Prince Vortigern had on,
> Which from a naked Pict his grandsire won."

Pope, in the "Dunciad," alludes to him in these terms:

> "And high-born Howard, more majestic sire,
> With fool of quality completes the choir."

Howard, (EDWARD,) a popular English novelist, was a lieutenant in the royal navy. He published "The Old Commodore," (1837,) "Ratlin the Reefer," (1838,) "Outward-Bound," etc. Died in 1842.

Howard, (EDWARD,) an English cardinal, born at Nottingham, February 13, 1829, a cadet of the family of the dukes of Norfolk. He became an officer of the Life-Guards, but when twenty-six years old took orders at Rome, and became personally attached to the household of Pius IX. In 1872 he was consecrated Archbishop of Neocæsarea and coadjutor to the Cardinal-Bishop of Frascati, and in 1877 was created a cardinal-priest. He was also protector of the English College at Rome, and in 1881 became arch-priest of Saint Peter's, and prefect of the congregation having care of the fabric of that basilica. Died September 16, 1892.

Howard, (FRANK,) an able English designer and writer on art, a son of Henry Howard the painter. He published "The Spirit of the Plays of Shakspeare, exhibited in Outline Plates," (5 vols., 1827–33,) and the "Science of Drawing," (1840.) Died in 1866.

Howard, (FREDERICK,) fifth Earl of Carlisle, an English poet and statesman, born in 1748, was the son of Henry, and grandson of the third Earl, noticed above. He succeeded to the family title in 1758. In 1778 he was one of the commissioners sent to persuade the people of the United States to submit to the British rule. He acted with the Whig party until the French Revolution, after which he supported the ministry. He published a volume of Poems, and several tragedies, one of which, called "The Father's Revenge," was commended by Dr. Johnson. His mother, Isabella Byron, daughter to the fifth Lord Byron, was first-cousin to the father of the poet Byron. Died in 1825.

Howard, (GEORGE EDMUND,) a British poet and architect, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He published in 1782 several volumes of miscellaneous works, the most important of which treat on the exchequer, revenue, and trade of Ireland. Died in 1786.

Howard, (GEORGE WILLIAM FREDERICK,) Earl of Carlisle and Viscount Morpeth, a statesman and author, born in 1802, was a grandson of Frederick, fifth Earl of Carlisle. He was styled Lord Morpeth before the death of his father, which occurred about 1848. Under the Whig ministry which was dissolved in 1841 he was secretary for Ireland. He visited the United States between 1842 and 1846, and, after his return, imparted to the public some observations on that country in a lecture. In 1854 he published a "Diary in Turkish and Greek Waters," which is a work of merit. He was lord-lieutenant of Ireland about three years, (1855–58,) and was reappointed to that office by Palmerston in June, 1859. He had the reputation of a liberal statesman and benevolent man. Died in 1864.

Howard, (HENRY,) Earl of Surrey, a celebrated English poet, born about 1516, was the son of Thomas, third Duke of Norfolk, and of Elizabeth Stafford. He excelled in the accomplishments of a scholar, courtier, and soldier, and cultivated as well as patronized the fine arts. About 1535 he married Lady Frances Vere. In 1544 he accompanied Henry VIII. in his invasion of France, was made a field-marshal, and was appointed governor of Boulogne after it was captured by the English. Soon after this he became the object of the king's suspicion. He was recalled in 1546, arrested with his father, condemned, and executed in 1547. He left two sons and three daughters. (With respect to Surrey's guilt or innocence, see Froude's "History of England," vol. iv. chap. xxiii.)

Surrey is the first who used blank verse in our language, and is considered the first English classical poet. He did much to improve the style of versification. One of his principal productions is a translation into blank verse of the second book of the "Æneid," which is admired for its fidelity and poetic diction. He also wrote numerous sonnets and songs. There is some doubt of the reality of his romantic passion for Geraldine, who is the subject of his most admired effusions. She was a child of thirteen, named Lady Elizabeth Fitzgerald, who afterwards became the wife of the Earl of Lincoln.

See HALLAM, "Introduction to the Literature of Europe;" WARTON, "History of English Poetry;" JOHNSON and CHALMERS, "Lives of the English Poets;" "Edinburgh Review," vol. xlii.

Howard, (HENRY,) Earl of Northampton, second son of the preceding, was born at Norfolk about 1539. He was a person of much learning, but of bad principles. He became a privy councillor at the accession of James I., who made him Earl of Northampton. In 1608 he was appointed lord privy seal. He was suspected of complicity in the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, and in the disgraceful conduct of his relative, the Countess of Essex. Died in 1614.

See GARDINER'S "History of England from 1603 to 1616," vol. i. chap. ii. pp. 63 and 64; also, chaps. x. and xii.

Howard, (HENRY,) born in 1757, was the son of Philip Howard of Corby Castle, England, and a descendant of the noble Earl of Surrey. He published "Indication of Memorials, etc. of the Howard Family," (1834,) and other works. Died in 1842.

Howard, (HENRY,) an English painter, born in 1769, entered the Royal Academy as a student in 1788. In 1790 he won two of the highest premiums,—a gold medal for the best historical painting, and a silver medal for the best drawing from life. After a visit to Rome he was chosen a member of the Royal Academy in 1808, and secretary of that body in 1811. His favourite subjects are classical and poetical, and are treated with elegant taste. Among his best works are "The Birth of Venus," "The Solar System," "The Circling Hours," and "The Story of Pandora." Died in 1847.

Howard, (Sir JOHN,) was a son of Sir Robert Howard and Margaret, a daughter of Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk. He was a partisan of the house of York during the wars of the Roses. He was created Duke of Norfolk in 1483, and was killed with Richard III. at Bosworth in 1485.

Howard, (JOHN,) F.R.S., a celebrated English philanthropist, born at Hackney, near London, in 1726. He was the son of a London tradesman, who died in his minority and left him an independent fortune. Having made a tour on the continent, he returned home and took lodgings with a widow named Loidore, by whom he was kindly nursed when his health required such attention, and whom he married out of mere gratitude in 1752, although she was more than twenty years his senior. After their marriage she lived only three or four years. In 1756 he embarked for Lisbon, in the desire to relieve the miseries caused by the great earthquake of 1755, but during the passage was taken by a French privateer, and detained in prison long enough to excite his lasting sympathy with prisoners and to impress him with the necessity of a reform in their treatment. After he was released he returned home, and married in 1758 Henrietta Leeds, with whom he lived happily at Cardington until her death in 1765. He had by this marriage one son, whose vicious habits produced first disease and then incurable insanity. Having been appointed sheriff of the county of Bedford in 1773, he witnessed with pain the abuses and cruelties to which prisoners were usually subjected. After visiting most of the county jails of England, and collecting much information respecting them, he induced the House of Commons in 1774 to begin a reform in prison discipline, to which his life thenceforth was constantly, heroically, and successfully devoted. In 1777 he published a valuable volume on "The State of the Prisons in England," etc. From 1778 until his death he was almost continually employed in traversing all parts of Europe, visiting prisons and hospitals, relieving the sick, and, as Burke expresses it, "taking the gauge and dimensions of misery, depression, and contempt." He died of fever in 1790, at Cherson, on the Black Sea. His habits were simple, temperate, and self-denying. Having been educated among Protestant dissenters, he continued in their fellowship through life.

Hŏw'ard, (JOHN EAGER,) an officer, born in Baltimore county, Maryland, in 1752. He commanded a regiment which distinguished itself by its brilliant bayonet-charge at Cowpens, January, 1781, and its gallantry at Guilford Court-House, March, 1781, and Eutaw Springs, in September of that year. He was chosen Governor of Maryland in 1788, and was a United States Senator from 1796 to 1803. Died in 1827.

See "National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans.

Howard, (LUKE,) an English meteorologist, born about 1770, published an "Essay on Clouds," (1802,) and other works on meteorology. Died in 1864.

Howard, (OLIVER OTIS,) an American general, born at Leeds, Kennebec county, Maine, in November, 1830. He was educated at Bowdoin College and at the Military Academy of West Point, where he graduated in 1854. He became first lieutenant of ordnance in 1857, and colonel of the Third Maine Volunteers in May, 1861. He commanded a brigade at Bull Run, July 21, and obtained the rank of brigadier-general in September, 1861. At the battle of Fair Oaks, May 31, 1862, he lost his right arm. He commanded a division at the battle of Antietam, September 17, and at Fredericksburg, December, 1862. In November, 1862, he was appointed a major-general of volunteers, and in April, 1863, obtained command of the eleventh army corps, which he led at Chancellorsville, and at Gettysburg, July 2 and 3, 1863. He served with distinction at the battle of Missionary Ridge and Chattanooga, November 25, 1863. In his report of this campaign General Sherman commends him as "exhibiting the highest and most chivalrous traits of the soldier." General Howard commanded the fourth corps of the army which, under General Sherman, fought its way from Chattanooga to Atlanta, May–September, 1864. He was appointed, July 27, commander of the army of the Tennessee in place of McPherson, who was killed near Atlanta. In the memorable march of Sherman's army from Atlanta to the sea, Howard led the right wing. From 1865 to 1872 he was chief of the Freedmen's Bureau. He commanded the Department of the Columbia, 1874–80, was superintendent of the West Point Academy, 1881–82, had command of the Department of the Platte, 1882–83, and later of the Department of the East until his retirement, Nov. 8, 1894.

Howard, (PHILIP,) of Corby Castle, England, was a descendant of the eminent poet the Earl of Surrey, and father of Henry, noticed above, (1757–1842.) He wrote the "Scriptural History of the Earth and of Mankind," (1797.) Died in 1810.

Howard, (Sir ROBERT,) M.P., an English poet, born in 1626, was a brother of the Hon. Edward Howard, noticed above. He was a royalist in the civil war, and, after the restoration, was appointed auditor of the exchequer. His most successful dramas were "The Committee" and "The Indian Queen." He was the original hero of "The Rehearsal," in which he is called Bilboa. "The poetry of the Berkshire Howards," says Macaulay, "was the jest of three generations of satirists." The poet Dryden married Howard's sister. Died in 1698.

See MACAULAY, "History of England," vol. iii. chap. xiv.; CIBBER, "Lives of the Poets."

Howard, (SAMUEL,) an English musical composer, who flourished about 1750, produced several popular ballads. Died in 1783.

Howard, (THOMAS,) second Duke of Norfolk, and Earl of Surrey, was a son of John, first Duke. He fought for Richard III. at Bosworth, where his father was killed, in 1485. He commanded the English army which gained a great victory over the Scotch at Flodden in 1513, and received the title of Duke of Norfolk for this service, before which he was styled Earl of Surrey. He died in 1524, aged about seventy, and was succeeded by his son Thomas.

Howard, (THOMAS,) third Duke of Norfolk, a son of the preceding, and an eminent English statesman and general, was born about 1473. In 1513 he was chosen high admiral of England, and, in co-operation with his father, defeated the Scotch at the battle of Flodden. For this service he was made Earl of Surrey, while his father was made Duke of Norfolk. In 1523 he became lord high treasurer, and in 1524, at the death of his father, inherited his title. His devotion to the Church of Rome made him hostile to Anne Boleyn, though she was his own niece. After Henry VIII. had married Catherine Howard, the duke, who was her uncle, had much influence in the royal councils, and used it for the persecution of the Protestants. In 1547 he was arrested on a charge of treason, and ordered for execution; but before the fatal day came the king died. Norfolk was released from prison in 1553, and died the next year. His son, the Earl of Surrey, was executed in 1547.

See FROUDE, "History of the Reign of Henry VIII.," particularly vols. iii. and iv.; HUME's and LINGARD's Histories of England.

Howard, (THOMAS,) fourth Duke of Norfolk, was a grandson of the preceding. He was the only peer who at that time possessed the highest title of nobility; and, as there were no princes of the blood, his rank, together with his great wealth and abilities, rendered him the first subject in England. He is represented as generous, prudent, and moderate, and sincerely attached to the Protestant religion. In 1559 Elizabeth appointed him her lieutenant in the northern counties. By aspiring to become the husband of Mary Queen of Scots, he gave offence to Elizabeth, and was committed to the Tower in 1569. Having been released, he renewed his suit, received a promise of marriage from the captive queen, and joined a conspiracy for her liberation. For this he was condemned and executed in 1572.

See HUME, "History of England;" FROUDE, "History of England," vols. ix. and x.

Howard, (THOMAS,) Earl of Arundel, a branch of the ancient and noble family of Howard, was employed in foreign embassies by Charles I. In 1639 he was appointed commander of an army raised to subdue the Scotch; but peace was made before any important action occurred. He formed an extensive collection of Grecian antiquities and productions of ancient artists, parts of which were presented by one of his heirs to the University of Oxford, under the name of the Arundelian marbles. His grandson Henry became sixth Duke of Norfolk. The earl wrote several relations of his embassies and voyages. Died in 1646.

Hŏw'dĕn, (JOHN FRANCIS CARADOC,) BARON, a British general, born in 1762, was the son of John Cradock, Archbishop of Dublin. He entered the army in 1777. In 1801 he was one of Abercrombie's staff, and was engaged in several battles in Egypt. He afterwards commanded the British army in India, and in Portugal in 1808. In 1831 he was raised to the peerage, as Baron Howden. Died in 1839.

Howden, (JOHN HOBART CARADOC,) BARON, an English diplomatist, a son of the preceding, was born in 1799. He served in the army, and gained the rank of major-general. He was ambassador to Madrid in 1850. Died 1873.

Hŏwe, (ALBION P.,) an American general, born in Maine about 1818, graduated at West Point in 1841. He became a brigadier-general in April, 1862, served at Antietam, September 17, and commanded a division at the battles of Fredericksburg, December 13, 1862, and Gettysburg, July, 1863. He was retired in 1882.

Hŏwe, (CHARLES,) born in Gloucestershire, England, in 1661, was employed as a diplomatist by James II. He wrote "Devout Meditations," of which the poet Young says, "A greater demonstration of a sound head and a sincere heart I never saw." Died in 1745.

Howe, (EDGAR W.,) an American author, born near Huntington, Iowa, May 3, 1854. He was bred a printer, and became a successful journalist of Atchison, Kansas. His principal works are novels,—"A Story of a Country Town," (which had great success,) and "The Mystery of the Locks."

Howe, (ELIAS,) an eminent American inventor, born at Spencer, Massachusetts, about 1819. While employed as a machinist he made many experiments for the invention of a sewing-machine, and about 1844 entered into a partnership with Mr. George Fisher, of Cambridge, who agreed to give him pecuniary assistance on condition of becoming proprietor of half the patent. In April, 1845, he finished a machine, which in essential points is esteemed by competent judges equal to any that have succeeded it. He obtained a patent in 1846. His invention not meeting in the United States with the success which he had anticipated, he resolved to visit England. He resided several years in London in great destitution, and returned in 1849, without having succeeded in making known the merits of his invention. Meanwhile the sewing-machine had been brought into general notice and favour, various improvements having been added by Mr. Singer, with whom, as an infringer of his patent, Mr. Howe had a law-suit, which was decided in his favour in 1854. Soon after the breaking out of the rebellion in 1861, Mr. Howe raised and equipped at his own expense a regiment, in which he served as a private until ill health obliged him to resign. Died October 3, 1867.

See the "History of the Sewing-Machine," in the "Atlantic Monthly" for May, 1867, by JAMES PARTON.

Howe, (JOHN,) an eminent English dissenting minister and author, born at Loughborough, May 17, 1630, was educated at Cambridge. Soon after he was ordained he was appointed domestic chaplain to Cromwell, then Protector, at whose death he was retained in the same office by Richard Cromwell. After the latter was deposed, Howe preached at Great Torrington, until he was ejected for nonconformity, in 1662. In 1675 he became minister of a Puritan congregation in London, where he continued to labour (except during a few years of absence) until his death. He was eminent for piety, for wisdom, for profound learning, and for classical scholarship. As an author he is highly applauded for his originality, sublimity, and evangelical spirit. Among his principal works are "The Living Temple," (1674–1702,) "The Blessedness of the Righteous," "The Redeemer's Tears," (1684,) and "The Vanity of this Mortal Life." Robert Hall said, "I have learned more from John Howe than from any other author I ever read." "Nothing in the language," says William Jay, "can equal, as a whole, Howe's 'Living Temple.'" He is accounted the most philosophical thinker among the Puritan divines. Died in 1705. His complete works were published in 8 vols., 1810–22.

Howe, (JOHN,) M.P., a noted English politician and versifier, was returned to the Convention Parliament for Cirencester in 1689, and was several times re-elected. He was conspicuous in the House for his volubility, asperity, and audacity of speech. Having turned Tory, he became in the reign of Anne a member of the privy council, and paymaster of the army. He wrote a "Panegyric on William III.," and several short poems. Died in 1721.

Howe, (JOSIAH,) an English poet and clergyman, became a Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, in 1637, and preached before Charles I. at Oxford in 1644. He wrote some epigrammatic verses prefixed to the works of Beaumont and Fletcher. Died in 1701.

Howe, (JULIA WARD,) an American poetess, daughter of Samuel Ward, a banker in New York, was born in 1819. She was educated with great care, and in 1843 was married to Dr. Samuel G. Howe, of Boston, with whom she has twice visited Europe, making on each occasion an extensive tour. Some of her poems possess merit of a very high order. Among the principal are "Passion-Flowers," published in 1854, and "Words for the Hour." She is the author of the deservedly popular song entitled "Battle Hymn of the Republic."

See GRISWOLD, "Female Poets of America."

Howe, (MARK ANTONY DE WOLFE,) D.D., LL.D., an American bishop, born at Bristol, Rhode Island, April 5, 1809. He graduated at Brown University in 1828, took priest's orders in the Episcopal Church in 1833, and in 1874 was consecrated Bishop of Central Pennsylvania, the first of that title. Among his works are a volume of "Essays and Poems," a "Memoir of Bishop Alonzo Potter," (1870,) etc.

Howe, (RICHARD,) EARL, a distinguished English admiral, born in 1725, was the second son of Lord Emanuel Scrope Howe. He entered the navy about the age of fourteen, and obtained the rank of captain about 1747. He distinguished himself in the Seven Years' war against the French. At the death of his elder brother, in 1758, he inherited the title of viscount. In 1763 and 1764 he occupied a seat at the board of admiralty, and in 1770 he became a rear-admiral of the blue, and commanded the Mediterranean fleet. From 1776 to 1778 he commanded on the coast of the United States, where he maintained his credit by skilful operations against the French fleet under D'Estaing. He was promoted to the rank of admiral of the blue in 1782, and in the next year acted as first lord of the admiralty. In 1788 he was created Earl Howe. On June 1, 1794, he gained a decisive victory over the French fleet, of which he captured seven ships of the line. Died in 1799. He was regarded as the first sea-officer of his time.

See CAMPBELL, "Lives of British Admirals;" GEORGE MASON, "Life of Richard, Earl Howe;" JOHN BARROW, "Life of Lord Richard Howe," 1838.

Howe, (Dr. SAMUEL GRIDLEY,) an eminent American philanthropist, born in Boston in 1801. He graduated at Brown University in 1821, and entered upon the study of medicine in his native city. In 1824 he went to Greece, and fought valiantly in the war of independence. When famine threatened that country in 1827, he came to the United States and procured large contributions of provisions, clothing, and money, which he distributed among the Greek patriots. On his return to his native city, in 1831, he entered with ardour into a plan for establishing in that city a school for the blind; and he visited Europe, to procure information, teachers, etc. The next year (1832) he opened the institution, (Perkins Institution for the Blind,) of which he became the principal. His success in the case of Laura Bridgeman, a deaf blind mute, whom he taught to read from raised letters and instructed in religion, morality, etc., attracted great attention. (See BRIDGEMAN, LAURA.) Dr. Howe also devoted much attention to the education of idiots, for whom a school has been established in South Boston. Besides his other labours, he distinguished himself by the active part he took in the anti-slavery cause. He is the author of a "Historical Sketch of the Greek Revolution," (1828,) a "Reader for the Blind," and various essays and reports on the education of the blind and the idiotic, etc. Died January 9, 1876.

Howe, (Sir WILLIAM,) an English general, was a younger brother of Admiral Richard Howe, noticed above. In 1774 he was returned to Parliament for Nottingham, professing to disapprove the policy of the ministers in relation to the Americans. In 1775 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the army sent to subdue the colonies, though deficient in nearly all the qualities which constitute a great general. His constituents censured him for accepting the command. His first exploit after this promotion was the battle of Bunker Hill, (1775,) in which he lost one-third of his men present in the action. In August, 1776, he gained the battle of Long Island and took New York City. He obtained an advantage over the Americans at Brandywine in September, 1777, in consequence of which Philadelphia was occupied by his army. At his own request, he was recalled in 1778, and was succeeded by Sir Henry Clinton. Died in 1814.

See BANCROFT, "History of the United States," vol. ix. chaps. v., vi., x., xiv., xxiii., xxv.

Howe, (WILLIAM BELL WHITE,) D.D., an American bishop, born at Claremont, New Hampshire, March 31, 1823. He graduated at the University of Vermont in 1844, took orders in the Episcopal Church, held rectorships in and near Charleston, S.C., and in 1871 was consecrated Bishop of South Carolina. Died Nov. 25, 1894.

Hŏw'el THE GOOD, or Hy'wel Dda, a Cambrian prince of the tenth century, noted as a legislator, succeeded his father Cadell as King of Wales. After visiting Rome about 926, he framed a code of laws, which continued in force a long time. Died in 948.

Hŏw'el or Hŏw'ell, (LAURENCE,) a learned English nonjuring divine, graduated at Cambridge in 1688. He wrote a "Synopsis of the Canons of the Latin Church," and other works on theology. For his pamphlet on the "Schism in the Church of England" he was convicted of sedition in 1716, and confined in Newgate until his death, in 1720.

Hŏw'ell, (JAMES,) a British author, born in Carmarthenshire about 1595. Soon after leaving college he went to London, and, as agent of a glass-manufactory, made a tour on the continent, where he learned several languages. He was returned to Parliament in 1627, and exercised his versatile talents in several civil offices until 1643, when he was imprisoned, for reasons not positively known. He was released about 1649, and at the restoration became historiographer-royal, being the first who had that honour. He wrote "Dodona's Grove, or the Vocal Forest," a poem, (1640,) and various prose works. His "Familiar Letters" (1645) are very entertaining, and passed through ten editions before 1750. Died in 1666.

See "Biographia Britannica."

Hŏw'ell, (ROBERT BOYTÉ CRAWFORD,) D.D., an American Baptist clergyman, born in Wayne county, North Carolina, March 10, 1801, graduated at Columbian College in 1826, was ordained in 1827, and held pastorships in Norfolk, Richmond, and Nashville, where he died, April 5, 1868. His principal works were "Terms of Christian Communion," (1854,) "The Deaconship," "The Way of Salvation," "Evils of Infant Baptism," "The Cross," (1854,) "The Covenants," (1856,) and "The Early Baptists of Virginia," (1857.)

Howell, (WILLIAM,) an English writer, of whose life little is known. He was at one time chancellor of the diocese of Lincoln. He wrote a "History of the World from the Earliest Times to the Ruin of the Roman Empire," a work of some merit. Died in 1683.

Hŏw'ellŝ, (WILLIAM,) a popular English preacher, born in 1778. He was minister of Long Acre Episcopal Chapel, and belonged to the Evangelical school. Several volumes of his sermons were published. Died in 1832.

See CHARLES BOWDLER, "Memoir of William Howells," prefixed to his Sermons, 2 vols., 1835.

Hŏw'ellŝ, (WILLIAM DEAN,) a distinguished American author, born at Martinsville, Ohio, March 1, 1837. He learned the printer's trade, and became a journalist at Columbus, Ohio. He was United States consul at Venice, 1861–65, and edited the "Atlantic Monthly," 1866–81. His works include "Poems by Two Friends," (by himself and John J. Piatt,) "Venetian Life," (1866,) "Italian Journeys," (1867,) "No Love Lost," (poem, 1863,) "Suburban Sketches," (1869,) "Their Wedding Journey," (1872,) "A Chance Acquaintance," (1873,) "A Foregone Conclusion," "The Lady of the Aroostook," "The Undiscovered Country," "Poems," "A Modern Instance," "A Woman's Reason," "A Counterfeit Presentment," etc. He has produced several plays, including "Yorick's Love," a strong and effective drama, from a Spanish original. Mr. Howells's style is one of great refinement, and many of his characters are drawn with remarkable clearness and effect.

Howick, LORD. See GREY, EARL OF.

Hŏw'ĭ-sŏn, (ROBERT REID,) an American author, born at Fredericksburg, Virginia, June 22, 1820. In 1841 he was admitted to the bar, and in 1844 was ordained to the Presbyterian ministry. His principal published works are "History of Virginia," (2 vols., 1846–48,) Lives of Generals Morgan, Marion, and Gates, and "God and Creation," (1883.)

Hŏw'itt, (ANNA MARY,) an artist and writer, a daughter of William and Mary Howitt, was born about 1830. She produced a work of merit called "The Art-Student in Munich," (2 vols., 1853,) and also wrote "The School of Life," (Boston, 1855,) which was highly commended. She was in 1859 married to a son of the poet Alaric Watts. Died in 1884.

Howitt, (MARY,) a popular English authoress and moralist, daughter of Samuel Botham, of Uttoxeter, was born March 12, 1799. She was educated as a member of the Society of Friends, and was married to William Howitt in 1821. They published jointly "The Forest Minstrel, and other Poems," (1823,) "The Desolation of Eyam, and other Poems," (1827,) "The Book of the Seasons," (1831,) and "The Literature and Romance of Northern Europe," (1852,) the most complete work on that subject in English. Mary Howitt is sole author of numerous instructive books, among which are "Hope on, Hope ever," (3d edition, 1844,) "Hymns and Fireside Verses," (1839,) "Sowing and Reaping," (1840,) and "Sketches of Natural History," (8th edition, 1853.) She translated many works of Frederika Bremer, and several stories of Hans Christian Andersen. "Her language," says Professor Wilson, "is chaste and simple, her feelings tender and pure, and her observation of nature accurate and intense." ("Blackwood's Magazine," vol. xxiv.) Died at Rome, January 30, 1888.

Howitt, (RICHARD,) a poet and physician, a brother of William Howitt. He published in 1830 "Antediluvian Sketches, and other Poems," which was noticed favourably by the reviewers. "Richard too," says Professor Wilson, "has a true poetical feeling and no small poetical power." He settled in Melbourne, Australia, and wrote "Impressions of Australia Felix," (1845.)

Howitt, (WILLIAM,) an eminent English author, born at Heanor, in Derbyshire, in 1792. was educated as a member of the Society of Friends. His first published work was "The Forest Minstrel, and other Poems," (1823,) partly written by his wife. Their other joint productions have been noticed in the article on MARY HOWITT. He wrote a "History of Priestcraft," (1834,) which was very successful, and often reprinted, "Rural Life of England," (1837,) and "Colonization and Christianity," (1839.) In 1840 William and Mary Howitt removed to Heidelberg, where they passed several years. His "Rural and Domestic Life in Germany" (1842) was received with favour both by the English and Germans. He published "Homes and Haunts of the Most Eminent British Poets Illustrated," (2 vols., 1847,) besides various other original works, and translations from the German, and edited "Howitt's Journal" (weekly) for about three years, (1847–49.) He described his adventures and labours in Australia (where he passed about two years) in his "Land, Labour, and Gold," (2 vols., 1855.) Among his important works are "Visits to Remarkable Places, Old Halls, Battle-Fields," etc., (2 vols., 1839–41,) and a "History of England," (6 vols., 1861,) "History of the Supernatural," etc., (1863,) "Letters on Transportation," (1863,) "Discovery in Australia, Tasmania, and New Zealand," (1865,) and "The Mad War Planet," (1871.) Died March 3, 1879.

Hrotsvitha, hrŏts'vee'tȧ, also written Hrosuitha, Hroswitha, and Roswitha, a celebrated German poetess of the tenth century, born in Lower Saxony, was educated in the convent of Gandersheim. She wrote Latin poems, which are valuable monuments of the literature of that time, and six dramas, (in Latin,) that rank among the best productions of the kind in the middle ages. Among her poems was one in hexameters, containing the history of Otto I., only half of which is extant.

See GUSTAV FREYTAG, "Dissertatio de Hrosuitha," 1839; DAUBER, "Die Nonne von Gandersheim," 1858; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Hrungnir, hrŭng'nir, in the Norse mythology, a giant, who, on his horse Gullfaxi, ("Goldmane,") visited Asgard, and, having become intoxicated, defied the gods, and threatened to carry Valhalla to Jötunheim, (the "habitation of the giants.") He was slain by Thor, who gave Gullfaxi to his own son Jarnsaxa. Some explain the foregoing myth by supposing Hrungnir (whose name they derive from hruga, to "heap up") to be a lofty mountain piled up to the sky, thus appearing to menace heaven itself. Its summit being smitten and rent by the lightning, is compared by the Norse poets to the head of a giant whose skull Thor ("thunder") broke with his terrible hammer.

Hrym, hreem, sometimes written Rymer, in the Northern mythology, the leader of the Frost-giants (Hrimthursar) in the great battle against the gods at Ragnaröck. The name is clearly another form of Hrim, "frost," and cognate with the Latin rima ("hoarfrost") and the Sanscrit himă, (Gr. χεῖμα,) "frost," or "winter."

Hua, hü'ă', (EUSTACHE ANTOINE,) a French lawyer, born at Mantes in 1759, was a moderate member of the Legislative Assembly in 1791. He became in 1818 attorney-general in the court of cassation. Died in 1836.

Hŭd'sǫn, (HENRY or HENDRIK,) an eminent English navigator, of whose early life nothing is known. In 1607 he commanded a vessel sent by some London merchants to discover a direct route to India by way of the North pole or Northern Ocean. Having advanced beyond 80° north latitude, he was prevented by the ice from making farther progress, and returned. He made several other unsuccessful attempts in that direction. In the service of the Dutch East India Company, he discovered in 1609 the river of New York which bears his name. He renewed the enterprise in April, 1610, and discovered and explored Hudson Bay, in which he passed the winter and suffered much for want of provisions. As he was returning in 1611, his crew mutinied, and, forcing the captain with eight men into a small boat, abandoned them to their fate. They were never heard of afterwards. A few of the mutineers returned to Ireland.

Hugo, hü'go', (VICTOR MARIE,) VICOMTE, a celebrated French lyric poet and novelist, a son of the preceding, was born at Besançon in 1802. His mother, Sophie Trébuchet, was a Vendean royalist, with whose political sentiments he sympathized in his youth. His first poem, "On the Advantages of Study," (1817,) obtained an honourable mention from the Académie Française. He received prizes for several royalist odes in 1818, and married Mdlle. Foucher in 1822. In the same year he published the first volume of his "Odes and Ballads," which quickly raised him to the first rank among the French poets of his time. He produced "Cromwell," a drama, (1827,) and a volume of odes, entitled "Les Orientales," (1828,) remarkable for richness of imagination. The literati of France having ranged themselves in two hostile schools, styled the Classic and the Romantic, Victor Hugo became the recognized chief of the latter, formed mostly of young men. Of his dramas, "Hernani" (first acted in 1830) and "Marion Delorme" (1831) proved brilliant successes. Among his most successful and popular works are "Notre Dame de Paris," a romance, (1831,) "Le Roi s'amuse," a drama, (1832,) "Les Misérables," a novel, (1862,) "The Toilers of the Sea," (1865,) and poems entitled "The Leaves of Autumn," ("Les Feuilles d'Automne,") which, says a French critic in the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale," "contain beauties of the first order." He was admitted into the French Academy in 1841, and raised to the rank of a peer in 1845. He gave his cordial adhesion to the republic of 1848, and was elected to the Constituent Assembly by the voters of Paris. He opposed Cavaignac, and in 1849 joined the party of advanced democrats, of whom he became a leader and distinguished orator. For his opposition to the coup d'état of December 2, 1851, he was banished. He retired to the island of Guernsey, where he resided until the fall of the empire, when he returned to Paris. In 1871 he was elected to the National Assembly, but soon resigned his seat and went to Brussels. He was expelled for his sympathy with the Communists there, and again returned to Paris. During his exile he published several works, among which are "Napoleon the Little," (1852,) "Les Contemplations," poems, (1856,) and "L'Homme qui rit," a romance, (1869,) translated under the title of "By the King's Command." Among his later works are "The Terrible Year," a poetical record of scenes and incidents during the siege of Paris, (1872,) "Ninety-Three," a romance, (1874,) "The Art of being a Grandfather," (1877,) "The Pope," (1878,) "Torquemada," (1882,) etc. Died May 22, 1885.

Hulse, hŭlss, (Rev. JOHN,) born at Middlewich, England, in 1708, founded the Hulsean Lecture of the University of Cambridge, in which he had graduated. Died in 1790.

Hulsemann, hōōl'seh-măn', (JOHANN,) a learned German Lutheran divine, born at Essen in 1602, was professor of divinity at Leipsic. Died in 1661.

Hulsius, hŭl'se-us, (ANTOON,) a Protestant scholar and theologian, born in 1615, became professor of divinity and Oriental languages at Leyden. Died in 1685.

Hulsius, (HENDRIK,) a theological writer, son of the preceding, was born at Breda in 1654; died in 1723.

Hulst, van der, văn dẹr hŭlst, (PIETER,) a Dutch painter, born at Dort in 1652, was successful in painting flowers, fruits, etc. He studied or worked in Rome. Died in 1708.

Hulthem, van, văn hŭl'tẹm, (CHARLES JOSEPH EMANUEL,) a Belgian bibliomaniac, born at Ghent in 1764. He made a vast collection of books, manuscripts, etc., which were purchased by the Belgian government for 279,400 francs. Died in 1832. A catalogue of his library was published in 6 vols., 1836.

Hultsch, hōōlch, (FRIEDRICH OTTO,) a German scholar, born at Dresden, July 22, 1833. He was educated at Leipsic. His chief work is "Greek and Roman Metrology," (1862.). He also published critical editions of several Greek authors, chiefly mathematical. His edition of Pappus is of special importance, since more than half of the text had never before been edited.

Hultz, hōōlts, (JOHANN,) a German architect, of whom little is known. The completion of the great tower of the cathedral of Cologne is ascribed to him. It was finished in the first half of the fifteenth century.

Humann, ü'măn', (JEAN GEORGES,) a French financier, born at Strasburg in 1780, became minister of finance in 1832; died in 1842.

Hum'bert I., (in Italian, Umberto, oom-bĕr'to,) King of Italy, was born March 14, 1844. He was the son of King Victor Emmanuel and of Queen Adelaide of Austria. At the battle of Custozza, in 1866, he acted as a lieutenant-general. In 1868 he was married to his cousin-german, Maria Margaret of Savoy, and in 1878 he succeeded his father as king.

Humbert, ü'bair', a French Dominican monk and writer, born at Romans about 1200; died in 1277.

Hum'bẹrt, CARDINAL, an eminent French Benedictine monk, born in Burgundy; died about 1063.

Humbert, ü'bair', (JEAN,) a Swiss Orientalist, born at Geneva in 1792, published, besides other works, an "Arabian Anthology," with French versions, (1819.) Died in 1851.

Humbert, (JOSEPH AMABLE,) a French general, born of humble parents at Rouvray, in Lorraine, about 1760. Having a fine figure, a pleasing address, and great audacity, he was rapidly promoted, and in 1795, as general of brigade, served under Hoche against the Vendean royalists. In 1798, as general of division, he commanded the army of about 1500 men which invaded Ireland, where, after gaining a victory over General Lake, he was forced to surrender to Lord Cornwallis. In 1802 he was employed in the expedition to Hayti under Leclerc, at whose death he returned to France in company with Pauline, the widow of Leclerc, and sister of Bonaparte. By aspiring to her hand he offended the First Consul. He consulted his safety by emigrating to the United States, where he lived in obscurity. Died at New Orleans in 1823.

Humboldt, hŭm'bōlt, von, [Ger. pron. fon hōōm'bolt,] (FRIEDRICH HEINRICH ALEXANDER,) BARON, an illustrious German savant and traveller, born in Berlin on the 14th of September, 1769. He was a son of Major von Humboldt, who served as adjutant or aide-de-camp to the Duke of Brunswick in the Seven Years' war. In 1786 he entered the University of Frankfort-on-the-Oder, where he studied natural science and political economy.

He became a pupil of Heyne, Blumenbach, and Eichhorn, at Göttingen, in 1788. In 1790 he travelled in France, Holland, and England, and published a treatise "On the Basalts of the Rhine." He studied mineralogy under Werner at Freiberg in 1791, and was appointed director-general of the mines of Anspach and Baireuth in 1792. He published in 1792 a work on subterranean plants, "Specimen Floræ subterraneæ Fribergensis." At an early age he cherished a passion to visit far-distant and unexplored regions of the globe. With this view he resigned his office about 1796, and passed some time at Jena, where he formed friendships with Goethe and Schiller. His reputation was extended by a treatise "On the Irritability of Muscles and Nervous Fibres," (1797.) Several of his projects for undertaking a voyage of discovery were frustrated by the wars that followed the French Revolution. At length, in June, 1799, he joined Aimé Bonpland in a voyage to South America. They spent about four years in the exploration of the northern part of South America, especially those portions which are drained by the Oronoco and the Rio Negro. They ascended the Magdalena as far as they could by water, and penetrated by land to Quito. In June, 1802, they ascended Chimborazo to a point nineteen thousand feet or more above the level of the sea, the highest point of the Andes ever reached by man. They passed nearly a year in the exploration of Mexico, visited the United States, and returned to Europe in July, 1804, with rich collections of plants, animals, and minerals. Humboldt became a resident of Paris, where he remained about twenty years, the greater part of which he spent in digesting and publishing the results of his observations. In this task he was assisted by Bonpland, Cuvier, Oltmanns, Arago, Kunth, and others. Between 1807 and 1817 they published, in French, a "Journey to the Equinoctial Regions of the New Continent," (3 vols.,) "Astronomical Observations and Measurements by the Barometer," (2 vols., 1808–10,) a "View of the Cordilleras, and Monuments of the Indigenous Peoples of America," (1810,) a "Collection of Observations on Zoology and Comparative Anatomy," (2 vols.,) a "Political Essay on the Kingdom of New Spain," (2 vols., 1811,) and "General Physics and Geology." He made an important contribution to botanical geography by his Latin work "On the Geographical Distribution of Plants according to the Temperature and Altitude," (1817.) His botanical collections were classed and described by S. Kunth in a work entitled "Nova Genera et Species Plantarum quas in Peregrinatione ad Plagam æquinoctialem Orbis novi collegerunt A. Bonpland et A. de Humboldt," (7 vols., 1815–25.) An English translation of his "Personal Narrative of Travels" was made by Helen Maria Williams, (5 vols., 1814–21.) In 1810 he was chosen a member of the French Institute in place of Cavendish. He removed to Berlin in 1826, and received, with the title of councillor, many marks of royal favour. At the request of Nicholas, Emperor of Russia, and at his expense, Humboldt, Ehrenberg, and Rose made in 1829 a scientific exploration of Asiatic Russia. Among the results of this extensive expedition was an excellent work by Humboldt, entitled "Central Asia: Researches on the Chains of Mountains and the Comparative Climatology," (3 vols., 1843.) He was sent to Paris on several political missions by the King of Prussia between 1830 and 1848. He published a "Critical Examination of the Geography of the New Continent," (5 vols., 1835–38.) When he was more than seventy-four years old, he composed his celebrated work entitled "Kosmos; Entwurf einer physischen Weltbeschreibung," ("Cosmos; Essay of a Physical Description of the Universe,") the first volume of which appeared in 1845, and the fourth in 1858. "The first volume," says the author, "contains a general view of nature, from the remotest nebulæ and revolving double stars to the terrestrial phenomena of the geographical distribution of plants, of animals, and of races of men,—preceded by some preliminary considerations on the different degrees of enjoyment offered by the study of nature and the knowledge of her laws, and on the limits and method of a scientific exposition of the physical description of the universe." "The author of the remarkable book before us," says the "Edinburgh Review" for January, 1848, "is assuredly the person in all Europe best fitted to undertake and accomplish such a work. Science has produced no man of more rich and varied attainments, more versatile in genius, more indefatigable in application to all kinds of learning, more energetic in action, or more ardent in inquiry, and, we may add, more entirely devoted to her cause in every period of a long life. At every epoch of that life, from a comparatively early age, he has been constantly before the public, realizing the ideal conception of a perfect traveller; a character which calls for almost as great a variety of excellences as those which go to realize Cicero's idea of a perfect orator. . . . Above all things is necessary a genial and kindly temperament, which excites no enmities, but, on the contrary, finds or makes friends everywhere. No man in the ranks of science is more distinguished for this last characteristic than Baron von Humboldt. We believe that he has not an enemy." The "Kosmos" has been translated into French by H. Faye and Ch. Galusky, (1848–57,) and into English by Mrs. Sabine. He received from the French government the title of grand officer of the legion of honour, and was a member of all the principal Academies of the world. Among his other works is "Aspects of Nature," ("Ansichten der Natur," 1808; 3d edition, 2 vols., 1849.) He died in Berlin, May 6, 1859, in his ninetieth year.

Humboldt, von, (KARL WILHELM,) BARON, a celebrated German philologist and statesman, born at Potsdam on the 22d of June, 1767, was a brother of the preceding. His early education was directed by Joachim Campe, a distinguished philanthropist. About 1788 he entered the University of Göttingen, where he studied philology under G. Heyne. Among the intimate friends of his youth was George Forster, the traveller. In July, 1789, he visited Paris, and hailed with enthusiasm the advent of the new régime. He afterwards studied at Jena, and there formed an intimate and lasting friendship with the poet Schiller, who encouraged and directed him in his literary pursuits. Humboldt became also the friend and literary counsellor of Goethe. About 1791 he married Caroline von Dachenröden. Among his early works was an excellent "Essay on the Greeks," (1792.) In 1799 he produced an admirable critical essay on Goethe's "Hermann and Dorothea," which established his reputation as a critic. He was appointed minister to Rome by the King of Prussia about 1802, and soon after that date produced a poem entitled "Rome," ("Rom.") He returned to Prussia in 1808, and was appointed minister of public instruction about the end of that year. He took a prominent part in the foundation of the University of Berlin. About 1810 he resigned his office, and was sent as ambassador to Vienna. While thus employed in the public service, he devoted his leisure time to the study of languages, in many of which he was profoundly versed. He acquired distinction as a diplomatist, and induced Austria to join the coalition against Napoleon in August, 1813. He represented Prussia at the Conference of Châtillon and the Congress of Vienna, 1814. Talleyrand's opinion of him is said to have been expressed in these words: "Europe does not possess three statesmen of such power," ("L'Europe n'a pas trois hommes d'état de cette force.") He was sent as ambassador to London about 1816, and was appointed minister and privy councillor at Berlin in 1819. He advocated a liberal constitution, and, when he found that the king was determined to adopt a reactionary policy, he resigned his office about the end of 1819, after which he took no part in political affairs. He composed numerous poems, the most of which remained in manuscript until his death, and many treatises on language, philology, etc. Among his principal works are an "Essay on the New French Constitution," (1792,) a metrical translation of the "Agamemnon" of Æschylus, (1816,) which is highly commended,

"Researches on the Aborigines of Spain by Means of the Basque Language," (1821,) and a "Memoir on Comparative Linguistic." He was one of the greatest philosophers and critics of his time, and has been called the creator of comparative philology. The interesting correspondence between Schiller and Wilhelm von Humboldt was published in 1830. In the latter part of his life he devoted his attention to the study of the languages of barbarous tribes of America and Asia. He died at Tegel, near Berlin, April 8, 1835, leaving unfinished an extensive and excellent work, entitled "On the Kawi Language in the Island of Java," ("Ueber die Kawi Sprache auf der Insel Java,") which was published in 1836. His works were collected and edited by his brother Alexander, under the title of "Wilhelm von Humboldts Gesammelte Werke," (4 vols., 1841–52.)

Hume or Home, (DAVID,) of Godscroft, a Scottish minister and writer, supposed to have been born about 1560. He preached some years in France. He wrote some Latin poems, "Apologia Basilica," ("Apology or Defence of the King," 1626,) and "The History of the House and Race of Douglas and Angus," (1644.)

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen."

Hume, (DAVID,) an eminent English historian and philosopher, born in Edinburgh on the 26th of April, 1711. He was a younger son of Joseph Hume or Home, who, though related to the Earl of Home, was not wealthy. In his Autobiography he says, "My studious disposition, my sobriety, and my industry gave my family a notion that the law was a proper profession for me; but I found an insurmountable aversion to everything but the pursuits of philosophy and general learning; and, while they fancied I was poring upon Voet and Vinnius, Cicero and Virgil were the authors which I was secretly devouring." For the sake of economy, he went to France in 1734 or 1735, and spent about two years at Rheims and La Flèche, where he wrote his "Treatise on Human Nature." This was published in London in 1738, but was treated with discouraging neglect. He says himself, "It fell from the press without reaching such distinction as even to excite a murmur among the zealots." Mackintosh calls this work "the first systematic attack on all the principles of knowledge and belief, and the most formidable, if universal skepticism could ever be more than a mere exercise of ingenuity." He passed several ensuing years in Scotland in his favourite studies, and issued in 1742 the first part of his "Essays, Moral, Political, and Literary," which was moderately successful. These contain new, ingenious, and suggestive ideas on commerce, political economy, and other subjects.

In 1746 he was appointed secretary to General Saint Clair, with whom he passed two years on the continent. Returning to his brother's residence in Scotland, he composed an "Enquiry concerning the Principles of Morals," and the second part of his Essays, which appeared in 1752, with the title of "Political Discourses." The latter of these was received with favour abroad and at home, while the other was scarcely noticed. About this time he commenced his most celebrated work, the "History of England," the first volume of which (comprising the reigns of James I. and Charles I.) was published in 1754. He describes its reception in these terms: "I was assailed by one cry of reproach, disapprobation, and even detestation: English, Scotch, and Irish, Whig and Tory, churchman and sectary, freethinker and religionist, patriot and courtier, united their rage against the man who had presumed to shed a generous tear for the fate of Charles I. and the Earl of Strafford; and after the first ebullitions of their fury were over, what was still more mortifying, the book seemed to sink into oblivion. Mr. Millar told me that in a twelvemonth he sold only forty-five copies of it." The subsequent volumes, however, were better appreciated, and the whole work became very popular and raised the author to affluence. The last volume was published in 1761. His style is generally admired, as graceful, natural, and perspicuous. But the value of his history is materially lessened by his partiality and inaccuracy. He was, as a skeptic, prejudiced against religion, and in civil government was inclined to favour prerogative. He is not profoundly versed in the philosophy of history, or in the progressive development of the British constitution. "He was far too indolent," says Alison, "to acquire the vast stores of facts indispensable for correct generalization on the varied theatre of human affairs." Macaulay compares him to "an accomplished advocate, whose insidious candour only increases the effect of his vast mass of sophistry."

Respecting his merits as a political economist, Lord Brougham says, "Of the 'Political Discourses' it would be difficult to speak in terms of too great commendation. They combine almost every excellence which can belong to such a performance. The great merit, however, of these discourses is their originality." In 1763 Hume accepted the office of secretary to the Earl of Hertford, ambassador to Paris, and having returned in 1766, much delighted by the caresses of the Parisians, he was employed two years as under-secretary of state. In 1769 he retired from office, and, with an income of £1000 a year, took up his residence in Edinburgh, where he died in August, 1776. Besides the works above named, he wrote the "Natural History of Religion," (1755,) and "Dialogues concerning Natural Religion," (1783.) He was never married. His personal character appears to have been amiable and respectable on the score of morality. "The Life of Mr. Hume," says Mackintosh, "written by himself, is remarkable above most, if not all, writings of that sort for hitting the degree of interest between coldness and egotism which becomes a modest man in speaking of his private history. Few writers, whose opinions were so obnoxious, have more perfectly escaped every personal imputation."

Hume, (DAVID,) an able Scottish lawyer, born in 1756, was a nephew of the preceding. He was professor of Scottish law in the University of Edinburgh, and a baron of the court of exchequer. He wrote a valuable legal text-book, entitled "Commentaries on the Law of Scotland respecting the Description and Punishment of Crimes," (1797.) Died in 1838.

Hume, (GRIZEL.) See BAILLIE.

Hume, (HUGH CAMPBELL,) third Earl of Marchmont, born in 1708, was a grandson of Patrick, the first Earl. He acted a prominent part in Parliament as an opponent of Walpole, and was keeper of the great seal of Scotland from 1764 to 1794. Died in 1794, without male issue.

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen."

Hume, (JAMES DEACON,) an English financier, born at Newington in 1774, obtained in 1790 a clerkship in the London custom-house. Having given proof of ability and energy in responsible positions, he was employed in 1823 in the arduous task of simplifying and reducing to order the multitude of discordant statutes by which the transactions of the custom-house were complicated and perplexed. For this important service he received from government a present of five thousand pounds, and in 1829 he was appointed assistant secretary of the board of trade. He resigned in 1840, and died in 1842.

See BADHAM, "Life of J. D. Hume."

Hume, (JOSEPH,) M.P., a British statesman of the Radical party, was born at Montrose, Scotland, in 1777. Having studied surgery, he entered as surgeon the service of the East India Company in 1797. He learned the native languages of India, and, by combining the functions of interpreter and paymaster with those of army-surgeon, he acquired a handsome competence, and returned home in 1808. By a careful study of the national resources and the condition of the people, he prepared himself for the task of a legislator and reformer, and entered Parliament in 1812. From 1818 to 1830 he represented Montrose in Parliament, where he gained great distinction by his industry and independence and by his important services to the working-classes. He was for many years pre-eminent in the House as a financial reformer and a sturdy opponent of monopolies and high taxes. He declined political preferment on several occasions, and continued to serve in the House of Commons until his death, in 1855.

See HARRIET MARTINEAU, "History of Thirty Years' Peace;" "Biographical Sketches," by the same, London, 1869.

Hume, (Sir PATRICK,) Earl of Marchmont, a Scottish patriot, was born in 1641. He was persecuted in the reign of Charles II., and escaped to Holland in 1684. Having returned in 1688, he was made lord chancellor in 1696, and Earl of Marchmont. Died in 1724.

Hume, (PATRICK,) a Scottish critic, who taught school in London. He published in 1695 "Annotations on Milton's Paradise Lost," which was the first attempt to illustrate that author, and was commended by Bishop Newton. His critical labours have been appropriated by later commentators. According to "Blackwood's Magazine," Hume is "the father of that style of comparative criticism which has been so much employed during these later days in illustrating the works of our great poet."

Humerus, hoo'mà-roos, (?) (LARS JOHANSSON,) a Swedish poet, known as "Lucidor the Unfortunate," born in Stockholm about 1642. He was educated at Upsala, where in 1668 he became a professor, but in 1669 he went to Stockholm and wrote verse for his living. He was murdered August 13, 1674. "The Flowers of Helicon" ("Helicons Blomster") is considered his poetical monument, but his hymns are his best work. With great faults of taste and style, he was by far the best Swedish writer of his times. He is called "Lars Johansson" in many bibliographies.

Humes, hūmz, (THOMAS WILLIAM,) D.D., an American educator, born at Knoxville, Tennessee, April 22, 1815. He graduated at East Tennessee College in 1836, held an Episcopalian rectorship, 1846–61, was president of East Tennessee University, 1865–79, and of the University of Tennessee, 1879–83. Died January 16, 1892.

Humières, d', dü'me-air', (LOUIS de Crevant—dẹh krẹh-vŏN',) DUC, a French general and courtier of Louis XIV., was created marshal in 1668, and commanded the right wing at the victory of Cassel, in 1677. He commanded the army in Flanders which was defeated by Waldeck in 1689. Died in 1694.

Hummel, hŏŏm'mẹl, (JOHANN ERDMANN,) a German painter, born at Cassel about 1770. He worked in Berlin, and became in 1809 professor of perspective, etc. in the Royal Academy of that city. Died in 1827.

Hummel, hŏŏm'mẹl, (JOHANN NEPOMUK,) an excellent composer and pianist, born at Presburg, Hungary, in 1778. About the age of eight he became a pupil of Mozart in Vienna, and at the age of sixteen he was accounted one of the most skilful performers in Germany. He entered the service of Prince Esterhazy in 1803, and became chapel-master to the King of Würtemberg in 1816. He was chapel-master to the Duke of Weimar from 1818 until his death, during which period he performed with applause in London, Paris, and Saint Petersburg. Among his best works are concertos and sonatas for the piano. Died in 1837.

Hummelius, hŏŏm-mā'le-ŭs, or Hummel, (JOHANN,) a German mathematician, born at Memmingen in 1518, was professor at Leipsic. Died in 1562.

Humphrey, hŭm'fre,* (HEMAN,) D.D., an American divine, born in Simsbury, Connecticut, in 1779. He graduated at Yale in 1805. He was six years minister in Pittsfield, Massachusetts. He became president of Amherst College in 1823, and was succeeded in that office by Dr. Edward Hitchcock in 1845, when he removed to Pittsfield. He wrote several valuable works, among which are a "Tour in France, Great Britain, and Belgium," (2 vols., 1838,) "Domestic Education," (1840,) and "Letters to a Son in the Ministry," (1845.) Died in 1859.

Humphrey, hŭm'fre, (LAWRENCE,) an English Calvinistic divine, born at Newport-Pagnel about 1527. In 1555 he retired to Zurich to escape persecution, and returned after the death of Queen Mary. He became professor of divinity in Oxford in 1560, and Dean of Winchester in 1580. He published several able theological works. Died about 1590.

Humphreys, hŭm'frẹz,* (ANDREW A.,) an American general, born at Philadelphia in 1810, graduated at West Point in 1837. He served against the Seminole Indians in Florida, and subsequently in the engineer department of the army, and on the coast survey and the hydrographic survey of the delta of the Mississippi. During the civil war he held important positions in the Union army, commanded a division at the battle of Gettysburg, July 1–3, 1863, and a corps in the battles near Petersburg in 1865. In 1866 he was appointed chief of engineers of the army. Retired June 30, 1879; died Dec. 27, 1883.

Humphreys, (DAVID,) an American poet, born in Derby, Connecticut, in 1753. He entered the army about 1776, and became in 1780 a colonel and aide-de-camp to General Washington. In 1784 he went to Europe with Jefferson, as secretary of legation. He aided Barlow and other poets in "The Anarchiad," and wrote other works, among which are a "Poem on the Happiness of America," and an "Address to the Armies of the United States," (1772.) He was sent as minister to Portugal in 1790, and to Spain in 1797. Died in 1818.

Hundt, hŏŏnt, (Magnus,) a German naturalist and writer, born at Magdeburg in 1449. He taught physics in the University of Leipsic. Died in 1519.

Hun'ę-ric or Hun'nę-ric, [Gr. Ὀυώριχος,] second King of the Vandals of Africa, was the eldest son of Genseric, whom he succeeded in 447 A.D.; but he did not inherit his father's abilities. He married the daughter of the emperor Valentinian III. His reign was extremely cruel and tyrannical. As an Arian, he persecuted the Catholics in particular. He died in 484, and left three sons, of whom Hilderic was the eldest; but Gondamond, a nephew of Huneric, was proclaimed his successor.

See Gibbon, "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire."

Hunfalvy, (John,) (in Hungarian, Hunfalvy János, hoon-fŏlvyę' yä'nosh,) a brother of Paul, noticed below, was born at Gross-Schlagendorf, June 8, 1820. In 1846 he was made historical professor at Käsmark. His works include "Universal History" and various books on Hungary. In 1870 he was appointed professor of geography in the University of Pesth. Died in 1888.

Hunfalvy, (Paul,) (in Hungarian, Hunfalvy Pál,) an eminent philologist, born at Nagy-Szálok, Hungary, March 12, 1810. He was educated at Pesth, and in 1842 became law-professor at Käsmark. Among his publications are one on the Finnish language, entitled "Chrestomathia Fennica," (1861,) "Ethnography of the Magyars," (1876,) and many other works, chiefly relating to the non-Aryan races and languages of Europe. Died in 1891.

Hu-nī'a-dēs or Hun'yą-dēs, [Hun. Hunyady, hoon'yŏdy; Fr. Huniade, hü'ne-ăd',] (Joan'nes Corvi'nus,) a brave Hungarian general, who about 1440 was chosen Vaivode of Transylvania. Soon after Ladislaus, King of Poland, was killed at the battle of Varna by the Turks, (1444,) Huniades was made captain-general of his army and Governor of Hungary. His chief exploit was the successful defence of Belgrade against Mahomet II., in 1456. He died of wounds received in this action. His son, Matthias Corvinus, was elected King of Hungary.

Hunnius, hoon'ne-ŭs, (Ægidius,) a Lutheran theologian, noted for intolerance, was born at Winnenden, in Würtemberg, in 1550. He was professor at Wittenberg, and wrote, besides other works, "Calvinus Judaizans," (1593.) Died in 1603.

See Hutter, "Threnologia de Vita Hunnii," 1603; Johann Georg Neumann, "Programma de Vita Hunnii," 1704; S. Gesner, "Leichenpredigt auf A. Hunnius nebst dessen Lebenslauf," 1603.

Hunnius, (Nikolaus,) an able Lutheran theologian, son of the preceding, was born at Marburg in 1585. He was superintendent of all the churches of Lubeck from 1623 to 1643. He wrote against Popery, Calvinism, and Socinianism. Died in 1643.

See L. Heller, "N. Hunnius, sein Leben und Wirken," 1843.

Hunold, hoo'nolt, (Christian Friedrich,) a German littérateur, who wrote under the pseudonym of Menantes, born near Arnstadt in 1680. His works include romances, tales, and poems. Died in 1721.

Hŭnt, (Alfred William,) an eminent English landscape-painter, born at Liverpool in 1830. He graduated with honours at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and won great distinction as a follower of Turner and an opponent of the naturalistic school of landscapists. His wife Margaret, a daughter of James Raine, was born at Durham in 1831. She wrote many novels, and made a translation of Grimm's "Tales" with the original notes.

Hunt, (Arabella,) an English musician and vocalist, who taught singing to Princess (afterwards Queen) Anne. One of Congreve's best-known poems was addressed to her. Died December 26, 1705.

Hŭnt, (Edward B.,) an American military engineer, born in Livingston county, New York, in 1822. He graduated at West Point in 1845, was employed as engineer on several forts and light-houses, invented a submarine battery, and gained the rank of captain in 1859. Died in 1863.

Hŭnt, (Frederick Knight,) an English editor, born in Buckinghamshire in 1814. After writing for the "Illustrated London News," etc., he was chief editor of the London "Daily News" from 1851 until his death. He wrote "The Book of Art," and "The Fourth Estate; or, Contributions to the History of Newspapers," etc., (1850.) Died in 1854.

Hunt, (Freeman,) an editor, born in Quincy, Massachusetts, in 1804. He became in 1839 the editor and owner of the "Merchants' Magazine," issued monthly in New York. He published, besides other works, "Lives of American Merchants," (2 vols., 1856.) Died in 1858.

Hunt, (George Ward,) an English politician, born in 1825. He was elected a member of Parliament for the county of Northampton in 1857, as a Conservative. He was re-elected, and gained distinction by a bill to counteract the cattle-plague of 1866. He became chancellor of the exchequer about March 1, 1868, and resigned in December of that year. Died July 28, 1877.

Hunt, (Harriot K.,) an American physician, born at Boston, Massachusetts, in 1805. In 1835 she began to practise medicine, but by reason of her sex could obtain no medical degree until 1853, when she received the doctorate from the Woman's Medical College of Philadelphia. She was noted as an able speaker on woman's rights, health-reform, etc. Died January 2, 1875.

Hunt, (Henry,) M.P., an English Radical, born in Wiltshire in 1773, acquired popularity with his party by his intrepid audacity and by his inflammatory harangues. He often presided at the meetings against the corn-laws. In 1820 he was arrested at Manchester, while addressing a political meeting, and punished with a fine and several years' imprisonment. He was returned to Parliament for Preston in 1831, defeating the Earl of Derby, his opponent, and witnessed the triumph of the Reform bill, for which he had toiled and suffered. Died in 1835.

Hunt, (Isaac,) a native of the West Indies, was educated in Philadelphia. He took the royalist side in the Revolution, removed to England, and became a preacher at Paddington about 1780. He published "The Rights of Englishmen." He was the father of Leigh Hunt.

Hunt, (James Henry Leigh,) a popular English poet and littérateur, born at Southgate, near London, in 1784, was the son of Isaac Hunt, noticed above, and Mary Shewell, of Philadelphia. He left school at the age of fifteen, and acted as clerk in the War Office until 1808, when he formed a partnership with his brother John to issue "The Examiner," a journal of liberal politics, which attained under his editorship a high reputation for literary merit. In 1812 the brothers were condemned to pay each a fine of five hundred pounds, and to be imprisoned two years, for a satirical article in which the prince-regent was styled an "Adonis of fifty." While in prison, he wrote "Rimini," (1816,) one of his most admired poems, "The Descent of Liberty," and "The Feast of the Poets." At this period he was intimate with Byron, Moore, Shelley, and Keats. From 1818 to 1822 he edited "The Indicator," a series of periodical essays, admired for genial humour, easy style, and brilliant fancy. In 1822 he was associated with Byron and Shelley as an editor of "The Liberal," a political and literary journal; and for this object he resided with Byron in Pisa and Genoa. But Shelley was drowned, Byron and Hunt became estranged, and after the issue of four numbers

"The Liberal" was discontinued. Hunt returned to England about 1824, and published "Recollections of Byron," (1828,) which gave great offence to Byron's friends. He was editor of "The Companion" and the London Journal," and wrote for several periodicals. Among the multifarious productions of his versatile genius are a popular poem entitled "Captain Sword and Captain Pen," (1835,) "Stories from the Italian Poets," "Men, Women, and Books," (1847,) "Imagination and Fancy," and his "Autobiography," (3 vols., 1850.) A pension of two hundred pounds was granted him in 1847. Died August 28, 1859. Professor Wilson, of Edinburgh, speaks of Hunt as "the most vivid of poets and most cordial of critics." ("Recreations of Christopher North.")

Hunt, (JEREMIAH,) an English dissenting minister, born in London in 1678, preached for many years at Pinners' Hall. Died in 1744.

Hunt, (LEIGH.) See HUNT, (JAMES HENRY LEIGH.)

Hunt, (RICHARD MORRIS,) a distinguished American architect, born in Brattleborough, Vermont, October 31, 1829. He was several years in the Boston High School. In 1842 he went to Europe, and studied architecture in Paris and Geneva. He subsequently visited various parts of Europe, and also Asia Minor and Egypt, for the purpose of becoming better acquainted with the architecture of different countries. After his return to Paris, he was appointed inspector at the Louvre; in 1867 he was a member of the jury on architecture at the Exposition Universelle. He has since resided in New York.

Hunt, (ROBERT,) an English author and philosopher, born at Devonport in 1807. His youth was passed in poverty, from which he was relieved by William Allen, the chemist, who procured him a situation in London. In 1832 he opened a druggist's shop in Penzance, having previously been a diligent student of chemistry and other sciences. He published his discoveries of the chemical action of the solar rays in an interesting work entitled "Researches on Light," (1844,) and in 1849 he gave to the world "The Poetry of Science." His "Panthea; or, The Spirit of Nature," (1849,) is designated by a writer in the "North British Review" as "a work of a very peculiar character, in which philosophy and poetry are finely blended, and where great truths and noble sentiments are expressed in language full of beauty and eloquence." Among his later productions are "Elementary Physics," (1851,) and "Memoirs of the Geological Survey of Great Britain," (1855.) He had a high reputation as a lecturer on science. He was the editor of three editions of Ure's "Dictionary of Arts," etc., and of the supplementary volume published in 1878. Died in 1887.

Hunt, (THOMAS,) D.D., an English scholar, born in 1696, became in 1747 professor of Hebrew in Oxford University. He wrote "Observations on the Book of Proverbs." Died in 1774.

Hunt, (THOMAS STERRY,) a distinguished American chemist and geologist, born in Norwich, Connecticut, in 1826. He studied medicine for some time in his native town, and afterwards became assistant chemist to Professor Silliman at Yale College. About 1847 he became connected with the geological survey of Canada, and professor of chemistry at Quebec. Besides his contributions to the London "Philosophical Magazine" and the Transactions of the Royal Society, French Academy of Sciences, etc., he published above seventy papers in the "American Journal of Science." While acting as a juror to the International Exhibition at Paris in 1855, Mr. Hunt had conferred on him the cross of the legion of honour; and in 1859 he was elected an honorary member of the Royal Society of London. Died February 12, 1892.

Hunt, (THORNTON,) an English journalist, the eldest son of Leigh Hunt, was born in 1810. He wrote, besides other works, "The Foster-Brother," (1845.) Died 1873.

Hunt, (WILLIAM HENRY,) an English painter in water-colours, born in London in 1790. His subjects are simple and homely, such as a "Peasant Boy" in various moods and phases, a "Farm-House Beauty," flowers, fruits, and other objects of still life. His works are admirable for colouring and perfection of finish. "I have seen," says Ruskin, "frequent instances of very grand ideality in treatment of the most commonplace still life by our own Hunt." ("Modern Painters.") Died in 1864.

See "Fraser's Magazine" for October, 1865.

Hunt, (WILLIAM HOLMAN,) an eminent historical painter, one of the chief founders of the pre-Raphaelite school of England, was born in London about 1827. He began to exhibit at the Royal Academy in 1846. About 1850 he and several other artists assumed the name of "Pre-Raphaelite Brethren," proposing to restore the art of painting from the degenerate style of Raphael and his coevals. His works are very minutely finished, and are close imitations of nature. Among his master-pieces are "Our English Coasts," (1853,) "The Awakening Conscience," (1854,) "The Light of the World," (1854,) and "The Shadow of Death," (1873.) "Hunt's 'Light of the World,'" says Ruskin, "is, I believe, the most perfect instance of expressional purpose with technical power which the world has yet produced." ("Modern Painters.")

Hunt, (WILLIAM MORRIS,) an American artist, born at Brattleborough, Vermont, in 1824. He entered Harvard College in 1840, but left in his senior year for a tour in Europe. He spent a winter in Italy and two years in Dusseldorf, after which he studied with Couture and Millet. From 1855 to 1862 he painted at Newport, Rhode Island, when he removed to Boston. In 1868 he opened an art school for ladies. His studio was burned in the great fire of 1872. In 1878 he painted two large pictures on the walls of the Assembly Chamber at Albany, but his health failed, and he died at the Isles of Shoals in 1879.

Hunter, (ANNE,) wife of the great surgeon John Hunter, and sister of Sir Everard Home, was born in Scotland in 1742. She wrote "My Mother bids me braid my Hair," and other songs, set to music by Haydn. Her poems, published in 1802, were praised by "Blackwood's Magazine." Died in 1821.

Hunter, (CHRISTOPHER,) an English physician and antiquary, born in Durham in 1675; died in 1757.

Hunt'er, (DAVID,) an American general, born in Washington, District of Columbia, in 1802, graduated at West Point in 1822. He became a colonel in May, 1861, served in the battle of Bull Run, July 21, was appointed a major-general of volunteers about August, and took command of the army and department of Missouri in November, 1861. About the 1st of April, 1862, he was appointed commander of the army at Port Royal, or Hilton Head. In May ensuing he issued an order that the "persons heretofore held as slaves in South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida are declared forever free." This order was annulled by the President as premature. He defeated General W. E. Jones at Piedmont, Virginia, June 5, 1864, after which he attacked Lynchburg (June 18) without success. He was made brigadier-general and major-general in 1865, and was retired July 31, 1866. Died February 2, 1886.

Hunter, (HENRY,) D.D., a Scottish divine and author, born at Culross in 1741, was a man of superior talents. From 1771 until his death he was pastor of a Scottish church in London. He was the author of a popular work styled "Sacred Biography," (1783–1802,) and translated Lavater's "Essays on Physiognomy," Saint-Pierre's "Studies of Nature," and other French works. His translation of Lavater, finely illustrated, sold for forty guineas a copy. Died in 1802.

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen."

Hunter, (HUMPHREY,) a patriot of the American Revolution, born in Ireland in 1755. About 1760 his widowed mother emigrated with her family to Mecklenburg, North Carolina. He entered the Revolutionary army in 1776, and rendered distinguished service at the battle of Eutaw Springs. He was ordained in 1789, and from 1805 till his death, in 1827, was pastor of the Presbyterian church at Steele Creek, North Carolina.

Hunter, (JOHN,) an eminent British anatomist and surgeon, born at Long Calderwood, near Glasgow, in 1728, was the youngest of ten children. After receiving a very defective education, he worked a few years with a cabinet-maker in Glasgow. In 1748 he went to London, where he was employed by his brother William as an assistant in the dissection-room. Having pursued the study of anatomy with ardour and remarkable success, he was received in 1754 as a partner in his brother's school, and lectured regularly for about five years. In 1760, for the sake of his health, he exchanged this employment for that of army-surgeon, and at the peace of 1763 returned to London. In 1767 he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, and soon after surgeon of Saint George's Hospital. He was eminent for surgical skill, and acquired greater celebrity by his researches in comparative anatomy, physiology, and natural history, on which he wrote several treatises. His museum is said to have cost £70,000. Died in 1793. He is admitted to be the greatest British anatomist of the eighteenth century, and was noted for originality, independence, and estimable moral qualities. Among his best works are a "Treatise on the Blood, Inflammation, and Gun-Shot Wounds," and another on "Certain Parts of the Animal Economy."

See EVERARD HOME, "Life of John Hunter;" JESSE FOOTE, "Life of J. Hunter," 1794; JOSEPH ADAMS, "Memoirs of the Life and Doctrines of J. Hunter," 1816; CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Hunter, (JOHN,) a Scottish critic, born at Closeburn in 1747, was for many years professor of humanity in Saint Andrew's, and published good editions of Horace, (1797,) Virgil, (1800,) and Juvenal, (1806.) Died in 1837.

Hunter, (JOHN KELSO,) a Scottish artist, born near Dundonald, December 15, 1802. He was bred a shoemaker, but in spite of many discouragements won recognition as a good painter, chiefly of portraits. He published "Retrospect of an Artist's Life," (1868,) "Life-Studies of Character," "Memorials of West-Country Men and Manners," etc. Died February 3, 1873.

Hunter, (Rev. JOSEPH,) an English antiquary, born at Sheffield in 1783. He was for many years minister of a congregation of dissenters at Bath. He published several valuable works, among which are a "History and Topography of the Deanery of Doncaster," (2 vols., 1828,) and "Illustrations of the Life and Studies of Shakspeare," (2 vols., 1845.) He was assistant keeper of the public records. Died in 1861.

Hunter, (ROBERT,) an English officer and writer, was appointed Governor of New York in 1710, and acted as Governor of Jamaica from 1728 until his death. He wrote a "Letter on Enthusiasm," ascribed to Swift and Shaftesbury. Died in 1734.

Hunter, (ROBERT MERCER TALIAFERRO,) an American statesman, born in Essex county, Virginia, April 21, 1809. He graduated at the University of Virginia, studied law, and commenced its practice in his native town in 1830. He voted for Jackson in 1832, and was elected to the legislature of Virginia in 1833. He was chosen a representative to Congress in 1837. His first speech in this body was in favour of the independent treasury and against a national bank. He also took strong grounds in opposition to the protective policy of Mr. Clay, and in all his subsequent career was an able advocate of free trade. In 1839 he was chosen Speaker of the House, and for his dignified and impartial discharge of its duties received, at the close of the term, in 1841, a unanimous vote of thanks. He favoured the election of James K. Polk, and supported his policy with regard to Texas and the tariff. The warehousing system, which was first incorporated in the tariff bill, was originated and drawn up by Mr. Hunter. He was elected in 1847 to the United States Senate, in which he served through two full terms, and was elected for a third term ending in 1865. He supported the Douglas Kansas-Nebraska bill in 1854, and the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton Constitution in 1858. He was secretary of state of the Southern Confederacy from July, 1861, to February, 1862, and was one of the two Senators who represented Virginia in the Senate at Richmond from February, 1862, to 1865. Died July 18, 1887.

Hunter, (WILLIAM,) a distinguished anatomist and physician, born at Long Calderwood, near Glasgow, in 1718, was a brother of John Hunter, noticed above. He received a liberal education in the University of Glasgow, and formed a professional connection with Dr. Cullen, who afterwards became so eminent as a medical writer. In 1741 he removed to London, where he acquired a high reputation as a lecturer on anatomy and a medical practitioner. He formed a partnership with his brother John in 1748. Having obtained a large and lucrative practice, he was appointed in 1764 physician-extraordinary to the queen. In 1767 he was chosen a Fellow of the Royal Society, to whose "Transactions" he contributed. About 1770 he founded in London an anatomical museum, to which were attached a classical library, and a cabinet of rare medals, which cost £20,000. The most important of his publications is the "Anatomy of the Gravid Uterus," (1774.) He died in 1783.

See S. F. SIMMONS, "Life and Writings of William Hunter," 1783; "Lives of British Physicians," London, 1857; CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen."

Hunter, (WILLIAM,) a British surgeon, born at Montrose, was employed in the service of the East India Company in Bengal. He published an "Account of Pegu," (1785,) "Caverns near Bombay," a "Hindostanee Dictionary," and several medical treatises. He was eminent as an Orientalist, and from 1794 to 1808 was secretary of the Asiatic Society. Died in 1815.

Hunter, (WILLIAM WILSON,) LL.D., a British publicist, born July 15, 1840. He was educated at Glasgow, Paris, and Bonn, and was sent to India in the civil service in 1862. He served with great honour in Orissa during the famine of 1866, and in 1871 was made director-general of statistics for India. Among his works are "The Annals of Rural Bengal," "Orissa," "Statistical Account of Bengal," (20 vols., 1876; prepared under his supervision,) "Imperial Gazetteer of India," (9 vols.; new edition, 1884,) "The Indian Empire," (1882,) etc.

Hunt'ing-don, (SELINA,) COUNTESS OF, an English lady, eminent for her piety and munificence, was the daughter of the Earl of Ferrers. Her maiden name was SHIRLEY. She was born in 1707, and in 1728 was married to Theophilus Hastings, Earl of Huntingdon. After her husband's death, about 1746, she lived in fellowship with the Calvinistic Methodists, chose Whitefield for her chaplain, and was noted for her zeal and devotion. She founded at Trevecca a seminary for preachers, built chapels, and spent large sums for religious purposes. Her sect was known as the "Countess of Huntingdon's Connection." Died in 1791.

Hŭrd, (RICHARD,) D.D., an eminent English writer and critic, born at Congreve in 1720, was educated at Cambridge, and became a friend of Warburton. He was appointed Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry in 1775, and translated to the see of Worcester in 1781. The archbishopric of Canterbury was offered to him, but was declined. Among his works, which are very numerous and able, are "Dialogues, Moral and Political," "Letters on Chivalry," (1762,) "Commentary on Horace's Ars Poetica," "Lectures on the Prophecies," and a "Life of Warburton," (1794.) "Hurd has perhaps," says Hallam, "the merit of being the first who, in this country, aimed at philosophical criticism: he had great ingenuity, a good deal of reading, and a facility in applying it; but he did not feel very deeply, was somewhat of a coxcomb, and assumes a dogmatic arrogance which offends the reader." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") Died in 1808.

See FRANCIS KILVERT, "Memoirs of Bishop Hurd," 1860; "Life of R. Hurd," by himself, in an edition of his Works, 8 vols., 1811; "North British Review" for May, 1861.

Hur'dis, (Rev. JAMES,) an English poet, born in Sussex in 1763, was a friend of the poet Cowper. In 1784 he became tutor to the Earl of Chichester's son, and in 1793 professor of poetry at Oxford. He wrote "The Village Curate," (1788,) "Sir Thomas More," a tragedy, and other poems. Died in 1801.

See "Retrospective Review," vol. i., 1820.

Huré, hü'rȧ', (CHARLES,) a French Jansenist writer, born at Champigny-sur-Yonne in 1639, was for many years an eminent professor of languages in the University of Paris. He published an approved "Dictionary of the Bible." Died in 1717.

Huret, hü'rȧ', (GRÉGOIRE,) a French engraver, born at Lyons in 1610. His work is easy and mellow, and his heads expressive. Died in 1670.

Hŭrl'bert, (WILLIAM HENRY,) a journalist, born at Charleston, South Carolina, July 3, 1827. He graduated at Harvard College in 1847, and at the Harvard Divinity School, was for a short time a Unitarian minister, and afterwards studied in Germany and at the Dane Law School. He became a journalist of New York, and for many years was one of the editors of the "World" newspaper. He has published "Gan-Eden," (1854,) "General McClellan and the Conduct of the War," (1864,) and other works, besides some hymns and poems.

Hurl'but, (STEPHEN A.,) an American general, born at Charleston, South Carolina, about 1815, commanded a division of General Grant's army at Shiloh, April 6–7, 1862. With the rank of major-general, he directed a corps of General Sherman's army in the raid to Meridian in February, 1864. Died March 28, 1882.

Hurl'stọne, (FREDERICK YEATES,) an English painter of history and portraits, was born in London in 1801. Soon after 1830 he joined the Society of British Artists, of which he became president. Among his works are "The Spanish Beauty" and "The Last Sigh of the Moor." His portraits are much admired. Died in 1869.

Hŭrst, (JOHN FLETCHER,) D.D., LL.D., an American Methodist bishop, born near Salem, Maryland, August 17, 1834. He graduated at Dickinson College in 1854, studied divinity in Halle and Heidelberg, and in 1858 became a preacher. He had charge (1866–69) of a Methodist theological institution in Germany. In 1871 he became professor of historical theology in the theological seminary at Madison, New Jersey, and in 1873 was appointed its president. He was elected a bishop in 1880. Among his numerous works are "History of Rationalism," (1866,) "Outlines of Bible History," (1875,) "Outlines of Church History," (1878,) "Our Theological Century," and "History of the Reformation," (1884,) besides several important theological works translated from the German.

Hurtault, hür'tō', (MAXIMILIEN JOSEPH,) a French architect, born at Huningue in 1765. He was appointed architect of the Fontainebleau Palace, in which he restored the gallery of Diana. Died in 1824.

Hurter, hōōr'tẹr, (FRIEDRICH EMANUEL,) a German historian, born at Schaffhausen in 1786, published a "History of Pope Innocent III.," (4 vols., 1834–42,) and a "History of the Emperor Ferdinand II. and his Family," (Ältern,) (9 vols., 1850–57.) Died in 1865.

Huš'bands, (HERMAN,) a native of Pennsylvania, became a leader of the "Regulators" in North Carolina in 1768, and fought against Governor Tryon in 1771. Died about 1794.

Huschke, hōōsh'kẹh, (EMANUEL GOTTLIEB,) a German philologist, born in 1761, published a good edition of Tibullus, (1819,) and other works. Died in 1828.

Huschke, (GEORG PHILIPP EDUARD,) a German jurist, born at Münden in 1801, published "Studies on Roman Law," (1830,) and other works. Died in 1886.

Hus'kis-sọn, (WILLIAM,) an English statesman and financier, born in Worcestershire in 1770, went to Paris in 1783, where he lived with one of his uncles and learned the French language. Sympathizing with the Revolution, he was present at the storming of the Bastille, and he became a prominent member of the "Société de 1789." In 1790 he was employed as secretary to Lord Gower, then ambassador at Paris, with whom he returned to England in 1792. Having attracted the favourable notice of Pitt, he was appointed in 1795 under-secretary in the department of war and the colonies, and the next year was returned to Parliament for Morpeth. He was secretary of the treasury from 1804 until the death of Pitt, and again from 1807 until 1809, when, as a friend of Canning, he resigned with him. In Parliament he represented successively Harwich, Chichester, (1812–23,) and Liverpool, (1823–30.) He gained distinction by his knowledge of finance and commerçe, and by his methodical and luminous reports. In 1823, under the auspices of Canning, he became president of the board of trade, treasurer of the navy, and a member of the cabinet. From the death of Canning (1827) to 1829 he acted as colonial secretary. In the latter part of his life he inclined to the policy of the Liberal party in respect to electoral reform, the corn-laws, and other restrictions on commerce. He resigned in May, 1829, because he differed from the Tory ministry. At the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway he was killed by an engine, September 15, 1830.

Hŭss, (JOHN,) [Ger. JOHANN HUSS, yo'hän hōōss; Lat. JOHAN'NES HUSS,] a celebrated reformer of the Church, was born at Husinec, (or Hussinetz,) in Southern Bohemia, in 1369. Being appointed in 1402 preacher at the Bethlehem Chapel in Prague, he became a zealous advocate of the doctrines of Wickliffe, whereby he incurred the censure of the Catholic clergy. As rector of the University of Prague, he had the works of Wickliffe translated into Bohemian; but they were soon after burned by order of Archbishop Sbinko. In 1412 he denounced the papal bull issued by John XXIII. against Ladislaus, King of Naples, and with his coadjutor, Jerome of Prague, condemned the sale of indulgences. He was excommunicated the next year, upon which he wrote his work "On the Church," exposing the abuses of popery. Cited before the Council of Constance in 1414, and provided with a pass by the emperor Sigismund, he was arrested on his arrival, and, as he adhered firmly to his opinions, he was burned by order of the treacherous emperor.

Hussein Pasha, hoos'sīn' pä'shä', a famous Turkish admiral, born about 1750, was a favourite of Selim III., who in 1789 appointed him capudan-pasha. He possessed superior talents, and served his master with fidelity in reforming the discipline and management of the navy. He commanded the fleet which in 1801 co-operated with the English against the French on the coast of Egypt. Died in 1803.

Hussein Pasha, (or Pacha,) last Dey of Algiers, born at Smyrna about 1773. At the death of Ali Pasha, in 1818, he was proclaimed his successor. To avenge an insult received by the French consul, the French government sent in June, 1830, an army which, after several days' fighting, forced Hussein to capitulate. He was deposed, and died in 1838.

See A. NETTEMENT, "Histoire de la Conquête d'Alger," 1857.

Hŭs'sey, (GILES,) an English painter, born in 1710, studied in Italy, and settled in London in 1742. He excelled in portraits, and attempted to apply to his art the hypothesis of harmonic proportions. Died in 1788.

Husson, hüs'sôN', (JEAN HONORÉ ARISTIDE,) a skilful French sculptor, born in Paris in 1803. He gained the grand prize of Rome in 1830. Among his works are "Dante and Virgil," a bas-relief, (1836,) a statue of Voltaire, (1839,) and a marble statue of "Haïdée," (1850.) Died in 1864.

Hu'ston, (LORENZO DOW,) a Methodist minister, born in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1820, preached in Kentucky, and edited several papers.

Hutch'e-son, [Lat. HUTCHESO'NUS,] (FRANCIS,) a metaphysician, born in the north of Ireland in 1694, was educated at Glasgow, and was ordained as a Presbyterian minister. While employed as principal of an academy in Dublin, he published about 1725 an excellent work, entitled an "Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue," which was followed by an "Essay on the Passions and Affections," (1728.) In 1729 he was appointed professor of moral philosophy in the University of Glasgow. Died in 1747. His greatest work, "A System of Moral Philosophy," was published in 1755. Sir J. Mackintosh thinks Hutcheson "was the father of the modern school of philosophy in Scotland." He adopted the opinions of Lord Shaftesbury in moral philosophy, and maintained that disinterested affections and a distinct moral faculty are essential parts of human nature.

Hutch'ins, (CHARLES LEWIS,) an American clergyman, born at Concord, New Hampshire, August 5, 1838, graduated at Williams College in 1861, and at the General Theological Seminary in New York. He became a presbyter of the Episcopal Church, and in 1877, 1880, and 1883 was the secretary of its general convention. His church and Sunday-school hymnals and collections of church music are widely known.

Hutch'ins, (Rev. JOHN,) born at Bradford-Peverel, in England, in 1698, wrote the "History and Antiquities of the County of Dorset." Died in 1773.

Hutch'ins, (THOMAS,) an American geographer, born in Monmouth county, New Jersey, about 1735. He was appointed geographer to the United States by Congress, and published, besides other works, a "Topographical Description of Virginia, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and North Carolina," (1778.) Died in 1789.

Hutch'in-son, (ANN,) a religious enthusiast, born in Lincolnshire, England, about 1600. She was the wife of William Hutchinson, whom she accompanied to Boston in 1636. She taught many doctrines which were condemned as heretical by the Synod of 1637. Mrs. Hutchinson herself was banished, and in 1642 removed to what is now Westchester county, New York. The next year her house was set on fire by the Indians, and she and all her family, consisting of sixteen persons, (except a child taken captive,) either perished in the flames or were killed by the savages.

Hutchinson, (JOHN,) COLONEL, an English Puritan and regicide, born at Nottingham in 1616. In 1638 he married Lucy Apsley. (See HUTCHINSON, LUCY.) In 1642 he obtained the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the army of Parliament, and next year was appointed governor of the town and castle of Nottingham, which he bravely defended in a long siege against the royalists. He was one of the judges who condemned Charles I., and afterwards was a member of the council of state. He was hostile to the government of Cromwell. After the restoration he was included in the act of amnesty, but, on a groundless suspicion of a treasonable conspiracy, was confined in the Tower and Sandown Castle from 1662 to his death in 1664. His character was excellent, and free from the austere errors to which the Puritans were most inclined.

See "Memoirs of Colonel Hutchinson," by his wife, 1806.

Hutchinson, (JOHN,) an English writer, born at Spennithorne in 1674, was the founder of the Hutchinsonian or mystical school of biblical interpretation. He was employed as steward by the Duke of Somerset, and afterwards as his riding-purveyor. His first work, called "Moses' Principia," was designed to refute the arguments of Newton's "Principia." He published, also, a "Treatise on Power, Essential and Mechanical," "Glory or Gravity, Essential and Mechanical," "The Hebrew Writings Complete," "Moses sine Principio," and other works. His leading idea is that the Hebrew Scriptures contain the elements of natural philosophy as well as of religion. His views excited much controversy, and were adopted by Bishop Horne, Parkhurst, and other eminent divines. Died in 1737.

Hutchinson, (JOHN HELY,) an Irish statesman and lawyer, born in 1715, resided in Dublin, and became secretary of state. Died in 1794.

Hutchinson, (JOHN HELY,) a British general, born in 1757, was the second son of the preceding. He entered the army in 1774. Having gained distinction in the Irish rebellion, he was made major-general in 1796. In 1800 he went to Egypt as second in command under Sir Ralph Abercrombie. When the latter was killed, in March, 1801, Hutchinson succeeded to the command, and obliged the French army under Menou to capitulate at Alexandria in the same year. He was rewarded for these services by the title of Baron Hutchinson. In 1825, on the death of his brother, he inherited the title of Earl of Donoughmore. Died in 1832.

Hutchinson, (LUCY,) an English authoress of great merit, was the daughter of Sir Allan Apsley, lieutenant of the Tower of London, in which Tower she was born in 1620. She was married in 1638 to Colonel John Hutchinson, noticed above, after having received a liberal education. She shared the counsels and dangers of her husband in the civil war, attended him in prison, and wrote Memoirs of his life, (1806,) which are greatly admired. "We have not often met with anything," says Lord Jeffrey, "more interesting and curious than this volume. . . . It challenges our attention as containing an accurate and luminous account of military and political affairs from the hand of a woman, and as exhibiting the most liberal and enlightened sentiments in the person of a Puritan. The views which it opens into the character of the writer and the manners of the age will be to many a still more powerful attraction."

See "Memoirs of Eminent Englishwomen," by LOUISA S. COSTELLO, London, 1844; "Edinburgh Review" for October, 1808, (vol. xiii.;) "Monk's Contemporaries," by GUIZOT, London, 1865.

Hutchinson, (RICHARD HELY,) Earl of Donoughmore, born in Dublin in 1756, was the eldest son of John H. Hutchinson, noticed above. He served in the army during the Irish rebellion of 1798, and in 1800 was raised to the peerage, as Earl of Donoughmore. In 1805 he obtained the rank of major-general. In Parliament he advocated with zeal and constancy the claims of the Catholics. He was created a peer of the United Kingdom in 1821. Died in 1825.

Hutchinson, (ROGER,) an early English Reformer, became Fellow of Saint John's College, Cambridge, in 1543. He left theological works, which were published in 1842. Died in 1555.

Hutchinson, (THOMAS,) a royal governor of Massachusetts, was born in Boston in 1711. He became a judge of probate in 1752, and chief justice of Massachusetts in 1760. His course in relation to the Stamp Act rendered him very unpopular. He succeeded Bernard as governor in 1769, and pursued a policy which tended to provoke a revolt in the colonies. When the tea was brought to Boston in 1773, the inhabitants, in town-meeting, resolved that it should not be landed, but be returned to its owners. Hutchinson, however, refused to grant the ships a pass. The result was the destruction of the tea by citizens in the disguise of Indians. In 1772, Dr. Franklin, colonial agent in London, had sent over to Massachusetts confidential letters written by Hutchinson to England, which showed that his whole policy had been characterized by duplicity and evasion,—that, professing to be the friend of the colony, he had secretly advised the sending of troops to Boston, and other obnoxious measures. He retired to England in 1774. Died near London in 1780. His principal works are a "History of the Province of Massachusetts Bay from 1628 to 1749," (2 vols. 8vo, issued in 1764–67,) and a "Collection of Original Papers relative to the History of Massachusetts Bay," (1769.) The "North American Review" calls his work "a mine of wealth to all future historians and antiquaries." "It is written," says Bancroft, "with lively inquisitiveness and lawyer-like criticism, though without a glimpse of the great truths which were the mighty causes of the revolution he describes."

Huth, hōōt, (GEORG LEONHARD,) a German naturalist, born at Nuremberg in 1705; died in 1761.

Hutin, ḥü'tăN', (CHARLES,) a French painter and sculptor, born in Paris in 1715, worked mostly at Dresden, where he died in 1776.

Hutten, von, fon hōōt'tẹn, [Lat. HUTTE'NUS,] (ULRICH,) a German poet and humanist, was born near Fulda in 1488. He studied at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, and afterwards at Pavía, in Italy. About 1520 he repaired to Mentz, where he published a succession of severe attacks on the Roman clergy, and soon after became acquainted with Luther, whose cause he openly espoused. Owing to the persecution he now encountered, he was obliged to take refuge in Switzerland, where he died in 1523. He possessed rare talents, but lacked discretion and morality. He was probably one of the authors of the famous "Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum," consisting of satires on the monks and the clergy, (1516.)

Hut'tọn, (CHARLES,) LL.D., an eminent English mathematician, born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne in 1737, was employed for some years as a teacher in his native place. Here he published treatises on arithmetic and mensuration. From 1773 to 1806 he was professor of mathematics in the Military Academy at Woolwich. In 1774 he was chosen a Fellow of the Royal Society, which he also served as foreign secretary and enriched with able scientific memoirs. He acquired celebrity by numerous works, among which are "Mathematical Tables," (1785,) "Elements of Conic Sections," a "Mathematical and Philosophical Dictionary," (1795,) a "Course of Mathematics," (1798,) etc. From 1804 to 1809 he assisted Shaw and Pearson in abridging the "Philosophical Transactions." He was eminent for benevolence, modesty, and simplicity of character. In 1807 his services were rewarded by a pension of £500. Died in 1823.

See ERSCH und GRUBER, "Allgemeine Encyklopaedie;" "Gentleman's Magazine" for 1823.

Hut'tọn, (GEORGE CLARK,) D.D., a Scottish divine of the United Presbyterian Church, was born at Perth, May 16, 1825. He was trained at the University of Edinburgh, and was ordained in 1851. Among his books are "Law and Gospel," (1860,) "Divine Truth and its Self-Evidence," (1853,) "The Rationale of Prayer," (1853,) etc.

Hut'tọn, (JAMES,) M.D., a philosopher and geologist, distinguished as the author of the Plutonian theory of geology, was born in Edinburgh in 1726. He graduated as M.D. at Leyden in 1749. About 1768 he became again a resident of Edinburgh, where he published, besides other works, a "Dissertation on the Philosophy of Light, Heat, and Fire," (1794,) and "Theory of the Earth," (1795.) His geological theory excited much discussion and opposition, being attacked by Kirwan and defended by Professor Playfair, who wrote "Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory of the Earth," (1802.) Died in 1797.

Hutton, (MATTHEW,) an English prelate, born in 1529, was made Bishop of Durham in 1589, and Archbishop of York in 1594. He wrote a work on Predestination. Died in 1605.

Hutton, (MATTHEW,) became Archbishop of York in 1747, and was translated to Canterbury in 1757. He published several sermons. Died in 1758.

Hutton, (WILLIAM,) an English antiquary and author, born of poor parents at Derby in 1723. He received a defective education. At the age of fifty-six he commenced his career as an author. His chief works are a "History of Birmingham," (1781,) a "History of Derby," (1790,) "Edgar and Elfrida," a poem, "The Roman Wall," (1801,) and an instructive volume of "Autobiography," (1816.) His daughter CATHERINE wrote "the Miser Married," a novel. He died in 1815.

See his "Autobiography;" "Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties," vol. i.

Huvé, ẑü'vā', (JEAN JACQUES MARIE,) a French architect, born at Versailles in 1783. He succeeded Vignon as architect of the grand church La Madeleine, which he finished. He was admitted into the Institute in 1838. Died in 1852.

See CHARLES LENORMAND, "Notice sur J. J. M. Huvé," 1853.

Hux'ham, (JOHN,) an English physician, born at Halberton in 1694, studied under Boerhaave at Leyden, and practised with success at Plymouth. He wrote several popular books on medicine, one of which is an "Essay on Fevers," (1750.) Died in 1768.

Hux'ley, (THOMAS HENRY,) F.R.S., an eminent English physiologist and naturalist, born at Ealing, Middlesex, in 1825. He was in his youth a surgeon in the royal navy. About 1848 he produced a treatise "On the Anatomy and Affinities of the Family of the Medusæ." He succeeded E. Forbes as professor of palæontology in the School of Mines about 1854, and became professor of physiology at the Royal Institution. Among his principal works is a "History of the Oceanic Hydrozoa," (1857,) "Man's Place in Nature," (1863,) "Lectures on the Elements of Comparative Anatomy," (1864,) "Protoplasm; or, The Physical Basis of Life," (1869,) "Lay Sermons, Addresses, and Reviews," (1870,) "Manual of the Anatomy of Vertebrated Animals," (1871,) "Critiques and Addresses," (1873,) "American Addresses," (1877,) "Physiology," etc., (1877,) and "David Hume," (1880.) In 1872 he was elected lord rector of Aberdeen University. Mr. Huxley is a very popular lecturer on natural science, and stands in the foremost rank among British physiologists and naturalists. In natural science he favours the Darwinian theory.

Huydecoper, hoi'dĕh-ko'pẹr, (BALTHASAR,) a Dutch poet and excellent critic, born at Amsterdam in 1695. He produced "Arsaces," (1722,) and three other tragedies, a good metrical version of the Satires, Epistles, and "Ars Poetica" of Horace, (1737,) and other poems. His "Essays, Philological and Poetical, or Observations on Vondel's Dutch Version of Ovid's Metamorphoses," (1730,) are highly commended. "All that he has done in this department," says the "Biographie Universelle," "is classical." Died in 1778.

Huygens or Huyghens, hī'gẹns, [Dutch pron. almost hoi'Hẹns; Lat. HUGE'NIUS,] (CHRISTIAN,) a celebrated Dutch astronomer and geometer, born at the Hague, April 14, 1629. He inherited the title of Lord of Zuylichem. About the age of sixteen he went to Leyden, where he studied law and mathematics under Vinnius and Schooten. Soon after leaving the university, he began to distinguish himself by his admirable scientific discoveries and mechanical inventions. In 1651 he published his "Theorems on the Quadrature of the Hyperbola," etc., and in 1656 discovered a satellite of Saturn with a telescope of his own construction. In 1657 he rendered important service to science and society by improving the clock, being the first to apply the pendulum to the measurement of time. Two years later he published, in his "System of Saturn," a description of Saturn's ring, which he had discovered with a telescope of twenty-two feet focal length. These and other successes had rendered him pre-eminent among the contemporary savants and philosophers of all nations. Newton was then a young student preparing to rival or surpass him. The years 1660 and 1661 were passed by Huygens in France and England. In 1663 he was chosen a Fellow of the Royal Society of London. From 1665 to 1681 he resided in Paris, whither Colbert had invited him in order to add éclat to the newly-founded Academy of Sciences. In this period he demonstrated the law of the impact of bodies, (1669,) wrote an elegant treatise on Dioptrics, and published his great work entitled "Horologium Oscillatorium," (1673,) dedicated to Louis XIV. Besides the theory of the pendulum, this work contains several very important mechanical discoveries, among which are the fact that the cycloid is the curve all the arcs of which, measured from the lowest point, are synchronous, and the theory (without demonstration) of the centrifugal force in circular motion, by which he made a near approach to those laws of gravitation afterwards proved by Newton. He has the credit of inventing the spiral spring which is used to regulate the balance of watches, which invention was also claimed by Hautefeuille. In 1681 Huygens returned to Holland, where he spent some years in constructing a planetarium, and telescopes of enormous dimensions, one of which had a focal length of two hundred and ten feet. In 1690 appeared (in French) his "Treatise on the Cause of Gravity," and a "Treatise on Light," which is esteemed one of his greatest works. It contains arguments in favour of the undulatory theory, which was first proposed by him and is now generally adopted. Died in 1695. He left a work styled "Cosmotheoros," (printed in 1698,) in which he advances bold speculations or conjectures on the constitution of the planets, which he believed to be inhabited. Huygens was never married. He loved retirement, and maintained a good character as a man. He kept up a friendly correspondence with Leibnitz and Newton, the latter of whom called him "Summus Hugenius."

Huyghens, HOI'HENS, (GOMARUS,) a Dutch Roman Catholic theologian, born in Brabant in 1631; died in 1702.

Huyn, hoo'in, (LUISE,) a German writer, born at Coblentz, November 6, 1843. Her works are mostly religious (Roman Catholic) tales, written under the pseudonym of M. LUDOLFF.

Huyot, ẑü'yo', (JEAN NICOLAS,) a French architect, born in Paris in 1780. He passed several years in the Levant, exploring the ruins of Ephesus, Thebes, Athens, and other cities. Died in 1840.

Huysman, hois'mân, sometimes written Houseman, (CORNELIS,) an eminent Flemish landscape-painter, born at Antwerp in 1648. He worked mostly at Malines, (Mechlin.) His colouring is praised by Descamps, who also observes that he had a great talent for painting mountains. Among his works is "The Disciples Going to Emmaus." Died in 1727.

Huysman or Houseman, (JACOB,) a Flemish painter of history and portraits, born at Antwerp in 1656; died in London in 1696.

Huysum, van, vän hoi'sŭm, (JACOB,) brother of Jan, noticed below, was born at Amsterdam about 1680. He excelled in flower-painting, and copied several of his brother's works with accuracy. Died in London in 1740.

Another brother, JUSTUS, born in 1684, excelled in battle-pieces, but died prematurely in 1706.

Huysum, van, (JAN,) a celebrated Dutch painter, born in Amsterdam in 1682, was a pupil of his father, Justus. His favourite subjects were flowers and fruits, in which he is thought to be unrivalled. His works unite tasteful composition, richness and harmony of colour, freedom of touch, and exquisite finish. His pictures were often adorned with insects, dew-drops, birds' nests, etc. He had a peculiar art of preparing his colours, which he always kept secret. Died in 1749.

Huysum, van, (JUSTUS,) THE OLD, a Dutch landscape-painter, born at Amsterdam in 1659, was the father of the preceding. Died in 1716.

Huzard, ẍü'zȧr', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a noted French veterinary physician, born in Paris in 1755, was a member of the Institute. He wrote numerous able and popular works on the veterinary art and rural economy, and he had collected a library of forty thousand volumes pertaining to his speciality. Died in 1839.

Hvitfeld, hvit'fĕld, (ARILD,) a Danish historian, born in 1549. In 1586 he attained the dignity of senator, and afterwards was chancellor of the kingdom. He wrote a "Chronicle of the Kingdom of Denmark," which is considered authentic. Died in 1609.

See KRAFT og NYERUP, "Litteraturlexicon for Danemark."

Hwiid, hweed, (ANDREAS CHRISTIAN,) a Danish critic, born at Copenhagen in 1749, was educated for the church, and was skilled in Oriental languages. He published a "Life of Cyrus the Great and the Younger," and several commentaries on Scripture. Died in 1788.

Hyacinthe. See HYACINTHUS.

Hyacinthe, e'ă'sânt', (CHARLES LOYSON,) PÈRE, an eminent French pulpit orator, born at Orléans about 1828. He became a Carmelite monk, preached for some time in Lyons, and removed about 1865 to Paris, where his conferences in the church of Notre-Dame attracted much attention. In September, 1869, he published, in a letter to the general of his order, a protest against the ultramontane doctrines and practices of the Roman Church, called forth by the Encyclical letter by which the pope had convened a general council. This protest caused a great commotion in the religious world, and drew down upon its author the major excommunication. In 1871 he was a member of the Old Catholic Congress at Geneva, of which Döllinger was the chief, and in September, 1872, he was married in London. In 1873 he became curate of the Old Catholic Church in Geneva, but resigned in 1874, when he went to Paris and established there the Gallican Church.

Hy-ą-cin'thus, [Gr. Ὑάκινθος; Fr. HYACINTHE, e'ă'sânt',] a beautiful Spartan youth, beloved by Apollo, by whom he was accidentally killed in a game of discus. The poets feigned that Apollo changed him into the flower called Hyacinth.

Hȳ'ą-dēs, [Gr. Ὑάδες,] Anglicised as HY'ADS, nymphs of classic mythology, and daughters of Atlas. According to the poetic legend, they were changed into stars, and now form part of the constellation of Taurus. When they rose and set with the sun, it was regarded as a sign of rainy weather.

Hȳ'att, (ALPHEUS,) JR., an American naturalist, born at Washington, D.C., April 5, 1838, studied at the Maryland Military Academy, at Yale College, and at the Scientific School of Cambridge, Massachusetts, where he graduated in 1862. In 1881 he became professor of zoology and palæontology in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. His principal works are "Memoirs on the Polyzoa," (1868,) and "Guides for Science Teaching," besides many important scientific papers. His special studies have been upon the lower forms of animal life.

Hȳ'att, (JOHN,) a Calvinistic Methodist preacher, born in 1767, officiated in the Tabernacle, London. He published several volumes of sermons. Died in 1826.

Hȳb're-as, [Ὑβρέας,] an eminent Greek orator, a native of Caria, flourished about 40 B.C.

Hȳde, (ANNE,) a daughter of Lord Clarendon, was born in 1637. She was married about 1660 to the Duke of York, afterwards James II. She was the mother of Queen Mary and Queen Anne. Died in 1671.

Hyde, (HENRY.) See CLARENDON, EARL OF.

Hyde, (LAWRENCE,) M.P., son of Sir Nicholas Hyde, distinguished himself by his successful efforts in promoting the escape of Charles II. after the battle of Worcester. The king passed one night in the house of Lawrence Hyde's tenant, and thence was conducted by Hyde to the sea-shore. Died in 1682.

Hyde, (LAWRENCE,) first Earl of Rochester, was the second son of Edward, Earl of Clarendon. He was an ultra Tory, and was the leader of the High-Church party in the reign of Charles II. He became first commissioner of the treasury in 1679. At the accession of James II., in 1685, he was appointed lord treasurer, (prime minister.) Though extremely subservient to the policy of the king, he was removed from office in December, 1686, because he would not turn Roman Catholic. After the flight of James II., Hyde gave his adhesion to William III. Died in 1711.

See MACAULAY, "History of England," vol. i. chaps. ii. and iv., vol. ii. chaps. vi., ix., and x.

Hyde, (Sir NICHOLAS,) an English judge, born in 1572, was the father of Lawrence Hyde, and uncle of the first Earl of Clarendon. He was appointed chief justice of the king's bench in 1626, and presided when Sir John Eliot was unjustly condemned to prison. Died in 1631.

Hyde, (THOMAS,) D.D., a learned English divine, born in Shropshire in 1636, became Archdeacon of Gloucester in 1678, professor of Arabic at Oxford in 1691, and regius professor of Hebrew in 1697. He excelled in Oriental languages, and was interpreter of the same to Charles II., James II., and William III. From 1665 to 1701 he was principal librarian of the Bodleian Library. He published a treatise on Chinese weights and measures, (1688,) and one on "Oriental Games," (1694.) His principal work, a "History of the Religion of the Ancient Persians and Magi," in Latin, (1700,) displays a vast erudition, and for a long time had a great reputation. "The variety and novelty of its contents," says Hallam, "gave this book a credit which in some degree it preserves; but Hyde was ignorant of the ancient language of Persia, and is said to have been often misled by Mohammedan authorities." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") He wrote other works, and compiled dictionaries of the Persian and Turkish languages. Died in 1703.

Hyde de Neuville, hĕd dẹh nuh'vĕl', (JEAN GUILLAUME,) a French politician, born in the department of Nièvre in 1776. He was an active royalist during the republic and the empire. After the restoration he acted with the ultra royalists as a deputy in 1815, and was minister to the United States of North America from 1816 to 1821. He was minister of the marine in the Martignac cabinet for a short time in 1828. Died in 1857.

Hyder, the German of HYDRA, which see.

Hyder-Alee or Hyder-Ali, hī'dẹr ȧ'lee, [sometimes written, in French, HAÏDER-ALI,] a celebrated Hindoo prince, born about 1718, entered the army of the Rajah of Mysore. His military talents procured his promotion to the command of an army, with which he captured Bangalore and fought against the Mahrattas. About 1759, by a bold and successful coup d'état, he obtained the chief power in Mysore, leaving his former master the title of rajah and a pension. The English, alarmed by his encroachments, formed a league with the Mahrattas against him, (1766.) In the war that ensued, Hyder gained such advantages that the English sued for peace and entered into alliance with him, (1769.) In 1771 he was defeated by the piratical Mahrattas, the English having failed to aid him according to the treaty. Having made an alliance with the French and the Mahrattas against the English, he suddenly invaded the Carnatic in 1780, took several fortresses, defeated some detachments, and ravaged the country almost to the walls of Madras. In 1782 he was defeated by Sir Eyre Coote at Porto Novo, and died in the same year, leaving his throne to his son, Tippoo Sâhib. Hyder was a Mussulman. He is reputed the most able enemy the British have had to contend with in India.

Hy'dra, [Gr. Ὕδρα; Fr. HYDRE, ēdr; Ger. HYDER, hee'der; It. IDRA, ee'drā,] a monster which infested the Lernean marsh and was destroyed by Hercules. It was said to have had nine heads. (See HERCULES.)

Hydre. See HYDRA.

Hȳ-ġe'ia or Hȳ-ġī-ē'a, [Gr. Ὑγίεια; Fr. HYGIE, e'zhe', or HYGÉE, e'zhā',] written also Hygea or Hygia, the goddess of health, in Greek mythology, said to be the daughter of Asclepias. She was represented as holding a cup in one hand, and in the other a serpent, drinking from the cup.

Hygie or Hygée. See HYGEIA.

Hy-ġī'nus [Fr. HYGIN, e'zhĀN'] became Bishop of Rome in 138 A.D., and died in 142. He is supposed to have been a Greek.

Hy-ġī'nus or Higinus, (CAIUS JULIUS,) a Roman grammarian, born in Spain or Alexandria. Originally a slave, he was set free by Augustus Cæsar, who gave him charge of the Palatine Library. He wrote a "Commentary on Virgil," and other esteemed works, which are lost. Other works bearing his name are extant, viz., "Mythological Fables," and "Poeticon Astronomicon," but are supposed to have been written by a Hyginus who lived at a later date.

Hyksos. See SHEPHERD KINGS.

Hylander, hü-lân'der, (ANDERS,) a Swedish Orientalist, born at Tunhem in 1750; died in 1830.

Hylaret, he'lā'rā', (MAURICE,) a French monk and preacher, born at Angoulême in 1539, was a partisan of the League. Died in 1591.

Hȳ'las, [Gr. Ὕλας,] a favourite of Hercules, whom he accompanied in the Argonautic expedition. The Naiads, enamoured with his beauty, drew him into the water, so that he was lost to Hercules forever.

Hyll, hil, (?) (ALBAN,) an English physician, who practised in London with a high reputation. He wrote a "Commentary on Galen." Died in 1559.

Hȳl'lus, [Gr. Ὕλλος,] a son of Hercules and Dejanira, was persecuted by Eurystheus, and after the death of his father was the leader of the Heracli'dæ. Aided by the Athenians, he invaded Peloponnesus, and defeated Eurystheus, whom he killed with his own hand.

Hȳ'men or Hymenæus, him-e-nee'us, [Gr. Ὑμήν or Ὑμέναιος; Fr. HYMEN, e'mĒn', or HYMÉNÉE, e'mā'nā',] the god of marriage of the Greeks and Romans, was represented as a handsome youth, crowned with flowers, and holding a nuptial torch in his hand. According to one tradition, he was a son of Apollo and one of the Muses. Another account makes him the son of Bacchus and Venus.

Hymir, hī'mir, written also Eymer, [supposed to be derived from humr, the "sea,"] the name of a great giant mentioned in the Norse mythology as the owner of a huge kettle, a mile deep, which Thor carried off, having first placed it over his head, so that he was entirely hidden by it. It was the same giant with whom Thor went a fishing and caught the World-serpent.

Hynd'fȯrd, (JOHN CARMICHAEL,) EARL OF, a Scottish diplomatist, born in 1701. In 1741 he was employed with credit as ambassador to the Prussian court, and in 1744 was sent in the same capacity to Russia. After successful efforts to terminate the war of the Austrian succession by a treaty of peace, he acted as envoy to Vienna in 1752. In 1764 he was appointed lord vice-admiral of Scotland. He died in 1767.

Hypatia, hī-pā'she-a, [Gr. Ὑπατία; Fr. HYPATIE, e'pā'te',] a celebrated female philosopher and mathematician, born at Alexandria in the latter part of the fourth century. She was the daughter of Theon, and displayed even greater talents than this famous mathematician in the study of philosophy and the sciences. She pursued her studies with great assiduity, often studying late in the night. After having improved herself by travelling and attending lectures at Athens of the most distinguished teachers of philosophy, she returned to Alexandria, where she was invited by the magistrates of the city to teach philosophy. She favoured the Neo-Platonic philosophy. She had many celebrated disciples, some of whom embraced Christianity and cherished through life feelings of friendship for her, although she continued to worship the heathen deities of Greece. She was noted for her virtue, her beauty, her simplicity of dress, her accomplishments, and her strength of mind. Orestes, the prefect of Alexandria, admired her wisdom, and often availed himself of her counsels. Cyril, the Christian patriarch, and his fanatical monks, appear to have regarded Hypatia as the principal supporter of the old religion; and at last their frenzy reached such a point that they tore her from her chariot as she was going to her school, and murdered her. This occurred in March, 415 A.D. The works of Hypatia were destroyed when the Mohammedans burned the library of Alexandria. Among these were a "Commentary on Diophantus," an "Astronomical Canon," and a "Commentary on the Conics of Apollonius of Perga." The titles of all her other works are lost.

Hypatie. See HYPATIA.

Hy-per'bo-rē-anē, [Ὑπερβόλος,] an Athenian demagogue, born about 450 B.C., was a leader of the democratic party after the death of Cleon. He was ostracised by a coalition of Nicias and Alcibiades in 415. Died about 410 B.C.

Hy'per-bo'rē-anē, a fabled race whom the Greeks placed (as their name indicates) in the far North, "beyond the North wind." They enjoyed perpetual youth, and lived in an earthly paradise separated from the rest of the world by the Rhipean Mountains.

Hypéride. See HYPERIDES.

Hȳ-per-ī'dēz, [Gr. Ὑπερείδης or Ὑπερίδης; Fr. HYPÉRIDE, e'pā'rēd',] a famous Athenian orator, was the son of Glaucippus, and a pupil of Plato. He was identified with the party that opposed Philip of Macedon. After the battle of Chærone'a, (338 B.C.,) he proposed to recall the exiles, to liberate the slaves, and to take other vigorous measures, which were adopted, and procured peace on favourable terms. Having refused to touch the gold with which Harpalus corrupted other orators of Athens, he was chosen to conduct the prosecution against Demosthenes for his share in that transaction. Hyperides was put to death by Antipater in 322. Cicero ranks him next to Demosthenes; and other ancient critics agree that his eloquence was of the highest order. Important portions of four of his orations were discovered in papyrus in 1847 and 1856.

Hy-perm-nes'trạ, [Gr. Ὑπερμνῆστρα; Fr. HYPERMNESTRE, ē'pĕrm'nĕstr',] one of the DANAIDES, which see.

Hȳp'sĭ-clēs, [Ὑψικλῆς,] a Greek mathematician of an uncertain epoch, is supposed to have lived at Alexandria in the second century. He wrote a treatise "On the Right Ascension of the Constellations of the Zodiac," which is extant. He is regarded by some as the author of the fourteenth and fifteenth books of the "Elements" of Euclid. According to Delambre, he lived about 146 B.C.

Hȳp-sip'ȳ-le, [Gr. Ὑψιπύλη,] a queen of Lemnos, who, according to tradition, saved the life of her father when the other women of the island killed their husbands and male relations. She was afterwards sold into slavery by the Lemnian women.

See LEMPRIERE'S "Classical Dictionary."

Hyrcan. See HYRCANUS.

Hyr-cā'nus [Gr. Ὑρκανός; Fr. HYRCAN, ēr'kŏn'] I., (JOHN,) high-priest of the Jews, was the son of Simon Maccabeus, whom he succeeded in 135 B.C. After the death of Antiochus Sidetes, 130 B.C., he conquered the Idumeans and destroyed the city of Samaria. Though educated as a Pharisee, in the latter part of his life he favoured their rivals the Sadducees. He died in the year 103, leaving his office to his son Aristobu'lus.

See JOSEPHUS, "History of the Jews;" Apocryphal Book of Maccabees.

Hyrcanus II., high-priest of the Jews, succeeded his father, Alexander Jannæus, in 76 B.C. His brother Aristobu'lus having usurped the regal power, Hyrcanus, who was a weak prince, appealed to the Roman Pompey, who restored him to the throne and priesthood. Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, with the aid of the Parthians, deposed Hyrcanus about 38 B.C., and was soon after supplanted by Herod, who married Mariamne, the granddaughter of Hyrcanus, and put the latter to death, 30 B.C.

Hyrtl, hĕr'tl, (JOSEPH,) an able anatomist, born at Eisenstadt, Hungary, in 1811. He became professor of anatomy in Vienna in 1845. He published, besides other works, a "Text-Book of Human Anatomy," (2 vols., 1847,) which has been adopted by the German universities as a standard. Died July 17, 1894.

Hȳs'lop, or His'lop, (JAMES,) a Scottish poet, born near Sanquhar, July 13, 1798. He became a schoolmaster in the navy, and died near the Cape Verde Islands, December 4, 1827. He is still remembered for his sweet and graceful verses.

Hystaspe. See HYSTASPES.

Hys-tas'pēs, [Gr. Ὑστάσπης; Fr. HYSTASPE, ès'tâsp'; Persian, GUSHTÂSP,] a satrap of Persia, and the father of Darius I., lived about 550 B.C. He is said to have been the first who introduced into Persia the learning of the Indian Brahmans. According to one account, he was the chief of the Magians, which accords with the Persian tradition that Gushtâsp patronized the religion of Zoroaster. (See GUSHTÂSP.)

I.

I-ac'chus, [Gr. Ἴακχος,] a surname or synonym of BACCHUS, which see.

I-am'be, [Gr. Ἰάμβη,] a servant-maid of Metanira, Queen of Eleusis, was said to be a daughter of Pan. By her jokes or tricks she amused Ceres when the latter was in distress. Iambic poetry is supposed to have derived its name from her.

Iamblichus. See JAMBLICHUS.

I-ap'e-tus, [Gr. Ἰαπετός; Fr. JAPET, zhă'pḛ',] in classic mythology, a Titan, and a son of Uranus. He was the father of Atlas, Prometheus, Epimetheus, and Menœtius. He is by some considered to be the same as the Japheth of Scripture. Iapetus was regarded by the ancient Greeks and Romans as the ancestor of the human race,* and, according to Scripture, the descendants of Japheth inhabited the "isles of the Gentiles," (Genesis x. 5,) which would seem to signify the numerous islands along the coasts of Europe and Asia Minor, and probably also the adjacent portions of the two continents; in other words, all that part of the world with which the early Greeks were acquainted.

I-ā'sĭ-on [Gr. Ἰασίων] or I-a'sĭ-us, a fabulous son of Jupiter and Electra, (or of Minos and Corythus.) He is said to have been beloved by Ceres, who bore him a son, Plutus, the god of riches.

Ibarra, e-bär'rä, (JOAQUIN,) a Spanish printer, born at Saragossa in 1725, carried on business in Madrid. He was distinguished for the perfection of his publications, especially for his editions of "Don Quixote," (1780,) and a Spanish version of Sallust, (1772.) Died in 1785.

I'bas, a Syrian priest of the fifth century, acted a prominent part in the disputes about Nestorianism. He was chosen Bishop of Edessa in 436 A.D. At the Council of Ephesus, in 449, he was deposed on the charge of favouring the Nestorians; but he was reinstated by the Council of Chalcedon in 451. Died in 457.

Ib'bet-sŏn, (Mrs. AGNES,) an English botanist, born in London in 1757. She investigated the structure of plants, and wrote botanical papers which were inserted in Nicholson's "Journal" and the "Philosophical Magazine," (1809–17.) Died in 1823.

Ibbetson, (JULIUS CÆSAR,) an English landscape-painter, born at Scarborough, copied and imitated with success the works of Berghem. He wrote an "Accidence or Gamut of Oil-Painting for Beginners." Died in 1817.

Ib'bŏt, (BENJAMIN,) an English divine, born near Swaffham, in Norfolk, in 1680. He became chaplain to George I. in 1716, and prebendary of Westminster in 1724. He delivered the Boyle lectures in 1713–14. Died in 1725. Two volumes of his sermons were published in 1726.

See DR. S. CLARKE, "Life of Benjamin Ibbot."

Iberville, ē', de'bĕr'vĕl', (LEMOINE or LEMOYNE,) a Canadian navigator, born at Montreal in 1642, distinguished himself in many actions against the English. He commanded a vessel sent by the French government to explore the mouth of the Mississippi, which he discovered in March, 1699. He ascended the river, and built a fort on its border. Died at Havana in 1706.

Ibi, ee'bee, (SINIBALDO,) an Italian painter, a pupil of Perugino, was born at Perugia, and flourished between 1505 and 1528.

IBN, ib'n, an Arabic word signifying "son," and forming a part of many names; as, IBN-HANBAL, the "son of Hanbal," etc. It is often written Ben; as, ALI-BEN-ABÎ-TÂLIB, for ALEE-IBN-ABEE (-ABÎ) -TÂLIB.

Ibn-Abeet(-Abî)-Yakoob,(or -Y'akûb,) ĭb'n ă'bee yă'kōōb' (Abool-Faraj, ă'bōōl făr'ăj,) otherwise called An-Nadeem (-Nadîm)-Mohammed-Ibn-Ishâk, ăn-nă-deem' mo-hăm'med ĭb'n is-hăk', an Arabian writer, chiefly known as the author of a valuable catalogue of books in the Arabic language, with brief and excellent notices of their authors. Nothing is known of his life, except that he wrote in the latter part of the tenth century.

Ibn-Al-Atseer, (-Atsyr,) ĭb'n ăl ât-seer', (Abool-Hassan-Alee, or Aboul(-Abûl)-Hassan-Alî, ă'bōōl hăs'săn ă'lee,) surnamed AZ-ED-DEEN, (AZZEDDYN,) (i.e. the "Splendour of Religion,") an Arabian historian, born in Mesopotamia about 1160, became a citizen of Mosul. He excelled in the science of prophetic traditions, and had great knowledge of history, as appears by his Complete Chronicle from the origin of the world to his own time. Died in 1233.

Ibn-Doreid, ĭb'n do'rād', (or do'rīd',) a celebrated Arabian poet, born at Bassorah in 838 A.D. He cultivated various kinds of poetry with distinguished success. Died at Bagdâd in 933.

Ibn-Hanbal, ĭb'n hăn'bāl, (Ahmed, ăH'med,) the founder of the fourth sect of orthodox Mohammedans, was born at Bagdâd (or, as some say, at Meru) in the year of the Hejrah 164. He attained a great reputation for virtue and knowledge of the traditions of Mohammed. He received many traditions from Shâfei, with whom he was intimate. For his refusal to acknowledge the Koran to have been created, he was scourged and imprisoned by the caliph Mótassem. He died at Bagdâd in A.D. 855. The sect became very numerous after his death. They are called Hanbalites.

Ibn-Khaldoon, (-Khaldoun or -Khaldûn,) ĭb'n kăl'dōōn' (Walee-ed-Deen- (or Waly-Eddyn-) Aboo-Zeid-Abd-er-Rahman, wā'lee ed-deen' ă'bōō zīd ăbd-er-rāh'mān,) a celebrated Arabian historian, born at Tunis in 1332. He removed to Cairo, where he distinguished himself by his uprightness as a judge, and was chosen chief of the Cadees (Cadîs) of the sect of Malekites in 1384. Afterwards, while on a journey to Syria, he was made prisoner by Taimoor, (the famous Tamerlane,) by whom he was treated with great kindness and respect. His principal work is a valuable "History of the Arabs, Persians, and Berbers, with Preliminary Observations," which was recently published in France. "We cannot but conceive, in reading this," says Silvestre de Sacy, "a very high idea of his judgment, sagacity, and erudition, and of the great variety of his knowledge." Died in 1406.

Ibrâheem, (Ibrâhîm,) written also Ibrâhym, the Arabic name of the patriarch ABRAHAM, which see.

Ibrâheem, (Ibrâhîm,) ib-rā-heem', thirteenth caliph of the Omeyyad dynasty, was the son of Waleed (Walîd) I. He began to reign in Damascus in 744 A.D., and a few months after was deposed by Merwân. The Arab historians disagree respecting his subsequent fate.

Ibrâheem (Ibrâhîm) I., (Aboo-Abdallah, ă'bōō ăb-dăl'lah,) founder of the dynasty of Aglabides in Africa, was the son of Aglab, and a native of Arabia. About 800 A.D. he was appointed Governor of Africa by Haroun-al-Raschid. After the death of the latter, (808,) Ibrâheem assumed the royal power. Died about 813.

Ibrâheem (Ibrâhîm) I., a Turkish Sultan, brother of Amurath IV., was proclaimed in 1640, at the age of twenty-three. His cruelty and other vices excited against him a powerful and successful conspiracy, by which he was deposed and strangled in 1648 or 1649. He was succeeded by his son, Mahomet IV.

Ibrâheem (Ibrâhîm) II., Emperor of Hindostan, the son of Iskander, began to reign in 1517, being the third of the Afghan dynasty. He was a very unpopular ruler. In 1526 the Mogul Bâber invaded India, a battle was fought at Paniput, where Ibrâheem was defeated and killed, and the Mogul dynasty was established in India.

Ibrâheem, (Ibrâhîm,) a favourite of Sultan Solyman II., was a Genoese by birth, and was taken to Constantinople by pirates in his infancy. He became grand vizier about 1523, and signalized his courage in the war against Hungary in 1527. He was put to death, at the instigation of the Sultana, in 1535.

Ibrâheem, (Ibrâhîm,) born at Aleppo, was the most eminent among the Ottoman jurists. His fame rests upon a great work styled the "Confluence of the Seas," ("Multeka al-Abhar,") which is a complete code of laws. Died in 1549.

Ibrâheem, (Ibrâhîm,) Pasha of Egypt, the son of Mehemet Alee, (Ali,) was born in Rumelia in 1789. He conquered the Wahabees, in Arabia, about 1818. In 1824 he commanded an army and fleet which Mehemet Alee sent against the Greeks. Having landed in the Morea with 10,000 men in 1825, he took several towns and committed many atrocities. The success of the allies at Navarino and the French invasion of the Morea forced him to retire to Egypt in 1828. In a war waged between the Viceroy of Egypt and the Sultan, Ibrâheem took Aleppo and defeated the Turks in a great battle at Konieh, in Syria, in 1832. His victorious progress was arrested by the intervention of the European powers in 1833. Died in 1848.

See LABAT, "L'Égypte, ancienne et moderne."

Ibrâheem (Ibrâhîm) Bey, a famous Mameluke chief, born in Circassia about 1735. He went to Egypt in his youth, and entered the service of Mohammed Bey. After the death of the latter, Ibrâheem shared with Moorâd Bey the sovereignty of Egypt. When Bonaparte invaded Egypt in 1798 and defeated Moorâd, Ibrâheem retired to Syria. In 1800 he took part against the French at Cairo, etc., and, after they evacuated Egypt, was again Governor of Cairo, until supplanted by Mehemet Alee. Died in 1816.

Ibrâheem (Ibrâhîm) Effendi, (ĕf-fĕn'dee,) a learned Turk, who was born about 1640, and filled considerable offices at Constantinople. He was converted to Christianity, was baptized in 1671, retired to Venice, and assumed the name of Paul Antonio Effendi. He translated several books of the Bible into Arabic. Died in 1697.

Ibrâheem (Ibrâhîm) Khan-Ogli, (o'glee,) was grand vizier of Turkey when Mahomet I. died, in 1421. He took measures to secure the succession of Mahomet's son, Amurath II., who was then absent from the capital. To reward this service, Amurath gave him the title of Khan, with hereditary privileges which made his family the first in the empire.

* The Arabic texts are by no means uniform in regard to the penultima of this name; it is often made short, but, if we mistake not, more frequently long, as given above. It is proper, however, to remark that a single instance of the insertion of the Alif (the sign of the long vowel) ought to outweigh several omissions, as the latter might more easily be the result of neglect or haste. The frequent omission of the long vowel in the manuscript of writers who are generally correct, merely proves that the insertion is not deemed absolutely indispensable. Its omission may be compared to the neglecting to dot one's *i*s in writing English,—a fault, undoubtedly, but a fault often committed by writers otherwise remarkable for accuracy.

Ibsen, ib'sĕn, (HENRIK,) a Norwegian poet and dramatist, born at Skien, March 20, 1828. He began life as an apothecary. His "Catiline," (1850,) a drama, was an ill-written production. In 1851 he went to the University of Christiania, and afterwards was director of theatres, first at Bergen and then at Christiania. "Love's Comedy" (1863) was his first great success. His "Emperor and Galilæan" is full of power and interest, and still more so is the drama of "Julian's Apostasy." Some of his other works, in spite of great merits, are dull and prosaic. His later poems are often laden with polished and powerful satire. He published various historical dramas of great excellence, and has taken a recognized place among the leading dramatists of recent years.

Ib'ў-cus, [Ἴβυκος,] a Greek lyric poet, born at Rhegium, in Italy, flourished about 560 B.C., and passed part of his life at Samos. His poems, which were chiefly love-songs, are lost, except a few fragments. He was the fifth lyric poet of the Alexandrian canon, and had a high reputation. He is said to have been killed by robbers. His death has furnished the subject of one of the finest of Schiller's minor poems, "Die Kraniche des Ibycus."

Ignatieff, ig-nä'te-ĕf, (NIKOLAI PAVLOVITCH,) a Russian general and diplomat, born at Saint Petersburg, January 29, 1832. He entered the army, was rapidly promoted, and was afterwards sent upon various important diplomatic errands. In 1858 he obtained from China the cession of extensive territories, and from 1859 to 1863 he was full ambassador at Peking. He was (1864-77) Russian envoy to Turkey, and in 1878 he negotiated the treaty of San Stephano, and was afterwards minister of the interior.

Ignatius, ig-nā'she-us, [Gr. Ἰγνάτιος; Fr. IGNACE, ĕn'yăss'; Ger. IGNAZ, ig-nâts'; It. IGNAZIO, ĕn-yät'se-o,] surnamed THEOPH'ORUS, one of the earliest Christian Fathers, and one of the most eminent among the immediate successors of the apostles, is supposed to have been a native of Syria. About 67 A.D. he became bishop or minister of the church of Antioch by the appointment of Saint Peter, or, according to some writers, of Saint John. He had filled this station acceptably about forty years, when the emperor Trajan began a persecution of the Christians. Ignatius was brought before Trajan at Antioch, and, refusing to renounce his religion, was condemned, and suffered martyrdom at Rome in 107, being exposed to wild beasts in the amphitheatre. His epistles to the Ephesians, Trallians, Magnesians, Romans, Philadelphians, Smyrneans, and to Polycarp are extant, and are regarded by many able critics as precious memorials of the primitive Church; but not a few scholars reject them entirely. There are eight other Ignatian epistles which are generally conceded to be spurious. In one of his epistles we find the words, "Now I begin to be a disciple; I weigh neither visible nor invisible things, that I may win Christ!"

Ignatius, Patriarch of Constantinople, born in 799 A.D., was the son of the emperor Michael Curopalates. When the latter was deposed, Ignatius entered a monastery, and became eminent for piety and wisdom. In 846 he was raised to the dignity of patriarch. Eleven years after, he was banished and cruelly treated for his opposition to Bardas, an uncle of Michael III., who appointed in his place the ambitious Photius. The schism between the Greek and Roman Churches began while Photius was in office, and has continued ever since that time. In 867 the emperor Basilius reinstated Ignatius, who assembled in 869 an œcumenical council at Constantinople, which condemned Photius and his party. Died in 877.

In'a-chus, [Gr. Ἴναχος,] a mythical personage, the son of Oceanus, and father of Io, is said to have been the first King of Argos. Having been chosen as umpire by Neptune and Juno when they disputed about the possession of Argos, he decided in favour of Juno.

Inca, ing'kă, (plural Incas,) a Peruvian or Quichua word, signifying "chief," and applied to the dynasty reigning in Peru on the arrival of the Spaniards in that country in the early part of the sixteenth century. As the Peruvians did not possess the art of writing, we have no means of ascertaining, or even forming a satisfactory conjecture respecting, the earliest date of their power. The Incas claimed to be the descendants of Manco Capac and his wife Mama Ocllo, who were the children of the sun. (See Manco Capac.) The empire of the Incas, at the period of their greatest power, extended through nearly forty degrees of longitude, and contained an area of between one and two million square miles. Their subjects, though unacquainted with letters, had in many respects advanced to a high degree of civilization. They understood the working of the precious metals, architecture, and many other arts, and were especially distinguished for the general liberality and wisdom of their state policy; though some of their laws and regulations were, according to the standard of Christian civilization, both unjust and inhuman.

Inch'bâld, (Elizabeth,) a popular English actress, novelist, and dramatist, born at Stanningfield in 1753, was the daughter of a farmer named Simpson. At the age of sixteen she came to London with the intention of becoming an actress, and was married to Mr. Inchbald, who had obtained some success on the stage. After performing with her husband several seasons at Edinburgh and other towns, she made her début at Covent Garden in 1780, and was very successful. Her success is ascribed in a great measure to her personal beauty and virtuous character. In 1789 she retired from the stage. She wrote "Such Things Are," "Every One has his Fault," "To Marry or Not to Marry," and many other plays. Her greatest productions are two novels, "A Simple Story," (1791,) and "Nature and Art," (1796,) which obtained extensive and durable popularity. Her "'Nature and Art,'" says Hazlitt, "is one of the most interesting and pathetic stories in the world." The other work is highly commended by Miss Edgeworth. Died in 1821.

Indrā, in'drą, [etymology doubtful; possibly related to the Latin imber, (Gr. ὄμβρος,) a "shower" or "rain-storm,"] the regent of the firmament, in the Hindoo mythology, is the son of Kasyapa and Aditi. As the god of storms and thunder, he may be said to correspond very nearly to the Roman Jupiter and Greek Zeus. In the early period of the Hindoo mythology he was (like Jupiter) regarded as the most powerful of the gods; but, after the introduction of the deities of the Hindoo triad, Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, Indra, Varuna, and Agni were deposed from their high rank and made to occupy a far inferior position. Krishna, an avatar of Vishnu, is represented, while still an infant, as baffling with the utmost ease the mightiest efforts of the god of thunder. (See KRISHNA.) Indra is supposed to preside over all atmospheric changes; the clouds are his war-elephants, one of which, represented with three trunks and called Irâvăt,* (I-rā'vąt,) is his vâhăn, (or "vehicle,"†) and his most terrible weapon is his văjrā, (pronounced by the modern Hindoos vŭj'rą or bŭj'rą,) or "adamantine thunderbolt."‡ The heaven or paradise of Indra is called Swarga or Swerga, (pronounced swŭr'gą.) Here dwell the Apsaras, the beautiful dancing-girls of his court, who may be said to correspond to the Hoorees (Houris) of Mohammed's paradise, and the Gandharvas, or celestial minstrels. The consort of Indra is named Indrânî, (indrā'nee.) His capital city is called Amrâvătî, (ŭm-rā'-vą-tee,) or the "city of immortality."

Iñes (ẽn'yĕs) or Iñez de Castro, ẽn'yĕth dȧ kȧs'tro, sometimes Anglicised as AGNES DE CASTRO, a beautiful Spanish lady, whose tragical fate is commemorated by Camoens in the "Lusiad," was born of a noble family in Castile in the fourteenth century. Having been a maid of honour at the court of Alphonso IV. of Portugal, she won the love of his son Don Pedro, who privately married her. The king, on learning the fact, was violently enraged, and, after vain efforts to dissolve their union, authorized her assassination in 1355. She was eminent for virtue, grace, and intelligence. Her story is the subject of numerous dramas, legends, etc.

Inguimbert, d', dăN'gĂN'bair', (JOSEPH DOMINIQUE,) a French bishop, born at Carpentras in 1683, assumed the name of DOM MALACHIE. He became an intimate counsellor of Pope Clement XII., who appointed him domestic prelate, and in 1733 Bishop of Carpentras. He built a hospital in that town, and founded a large public library there. He wrote and translated several religious works. Died in 1757.

See VITALIS, "Notice sur la Vie de Malachie d'Inguimbert," 1812.

Ingulf. See INGULPHUS.

In-gul'phus or In'gulf, a monk, born in London about 1030, became secretary and favourite of William, Duke of Normandy, in 1051. After that prince had become King of England, Ingulphus was made abbot of the monastery of Croyland. He died in 1109. He was the reputed author of a History of the above monastery, in Latin, containing much curious and important information; but Sir Francis Palgrave has proved that it is a forgery.

In'i-go, an English engraver, whose proper name was JOHN COLLET, was born about 1725. He excelled in the same line as Hogarth, and displayed an original genius for humorous design. He left but few works, among which is a "Monkey pointing to a Very Dark Picture of Moses striking the Rock." Died in 1780.

In'man, (HENRY,) an American portrait-painter, born at Utica, New York, in 1801, was a pupil of Jarvis. He worked mostly in the city of New York. During a visit to England, in 1844, he painted portraits of the poet Wordsworth, Dr. Chalmers, and T. B. Macaulay. Among his other works are portraits of Chief-Justice Marshall and Bishop White. He was commissioned by Congress to adorn the national capitol with historical paintings; but before he had finished them he died, in 1846.

See DUNLAP, "Rise and Progress of the Arts of Design in America;" TUCKERMAN, "Book of the Artists."

Inman, (JOHN,) a brother of the preceding, born at Utica, New York, in 1805, was an associate editor of the "New York Mirror" and "The Commercial Advertiser." Died in 1850.

In'nęs, (COSMO,) a Scottish lawyer, historian, and antiquary, born at Durris on Deeside, September 9, 1798. He early became known as a student of the ancient records of Scottish history. He was made an advocate in 1822. He collated and edited the chartularies of the old religious houses of the North, was employed for many years in editing and publishing the Scottish statutes, and was the author of "Scotland in the Middle Ages," (1860,) "Lectures on Scotch Legal Antiquities," (1872,) etc. He had a strong leaning to Catholicism, though he never gave his personal allegiance to that religion, and his works were greatly valued by Montalembert and other distinguished Catholics. He died at Killin, July 31, 1874. A "Memoir of Cosmo Innes" was published anonymously, in 1874, by Mrs. John Hill Burton.

In'nes, (LOUIS,) a Roman Catholic priest, born of a Scottish family about 1650. He became secretary to James II. after he was deposed from the English throne. He is the reputed author of "Memoirs of James II.," part of which was published in 1816. Died in Paris, January 23, 1738.

Innes, (THOMAS,) a brother of the preceding, born in 1662, studied in Paris, was ordained a priest, and succeeded Louis as principal of the Scottish College. He wrote a "Critical Essay on the Ancient Inhabitants of the Northern Parts of Britain," (1729,) which is highly commended for sound learning, judicious criticism, and valuable information. Died in 1744.

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen."

In'ness, (GEORGE,) an American artist, born at Newburgh, New York, May 1, 1823. He studied art in New York and in the European capitals, chronic ill health interfering much with the continuity of his labours. Taken at his best, Mr. Inness was inferior to no other American landscapist. His work was so informed with high spiritual purpose that some critics classed him, without complete justice, with the "Impressionist" school. He was a member of the National Academy. Died August 3, 1894. His son, GEORGE INNESS, Junior, is a painter of much promise.

In'no-cent [Lat. INNOCEN'TIUS; It. INNOCENZO, ĕn-no-chĕn'zo; Ger. INNOCENZ, in'no-tsĕnts; Span. INOCENCIO, e-no-thĕn'the-o] I., a native of Albano, chosen Bishop of Rome in 402 A.D., was contemporary with Augustine and Jerome. During his pontificate, Rome was pillaged by Alaric the Goth. Innocent strenuously asserted the supremacy of the see of Rome, and condemned the doctrine of Pelagius. He succeeded Anastasius I., who, according to Jerome, was the father of Innocent. Died in 417. He was succeeded by Zosimus.

See BRUYS, "Histoire des Papes," 5 vols., 1735.

Innocent II., POPE, was elected in 1130 as successor to Honorius II. Another party elected a rival pope, under the name of Anacletus II., whose partisans drove Innocent out of Rome. The latter was recognized as pope by the Kings of France, England, and Germany, and his rival was supported by Roger of Sicily. In 1138, Innocent, assisted by Lotharius of Germany, recovered the papal power, and, his rival having died in the same year, the unity of the Church was restored. In 1139 Arnaldo da Brescia was banished from Rome for preaching doctrines that were deemed unsound. Innocent died in 1143, and was succeeded by Celestine II.

See PLATINA, "Vite de' summi Pontefici," 1613; ALLETZ, "Histoire des Papes," 1776; J. HARTMANN, "Vita Innocentii II. Pontificis," 1744; ARTAUD DE MONTOR, "Histoire des souverains Pontifes," 1847-49.

Innocent III., whose proper name was Lotharius, was the son of Trasimund, a Roman count, and was born in Rome in 1161. He was unanimously elected pope in January, 1198, as successor to Celestine III. With superior abilities, improved by diligent study, he combined great resolution, industry, and austerity of character, and availed himself of every opportunity to magnify his office and to assert the supremacy of the papal power. In 1199 he placed the kingdom of France under an interdict because the king, Philip Augustus, had repudiated his wife; and thus he compelled him to reinstate her. About 1200 he instigated the fourth crusade, the principal result of which was the capture of Constantinople from the Greeks by the crusaders. In 1212 he excommunicated and deposed Otho, Emperor of Germany, and crowned Frederick of Sicily in his place. A memorable quarrel occurred between this pontiff and King John of England, respecting the appointment of the Archbishop of Canterbury, (1207,) the right to appoint being obstinately asserted by each. England was laid under an interdict, which lasted two years, at the expiration of which, as John was still refractory, the pope declared him to be deposed, and authorized Philip Augustus of France to execute the decree. While the latter was preparing to invade England, John submitted to the pope, in 1213, and signed a disgraceful treaty, in which he consented to hold England and Ireland as fiefs of the Church of Rome, and to pay an annual tribute of one thousand marks. In 1214 Innocent raised a cruel persecution or crusade against the Albigenses for heresy. During his pontificate the papal power attained its greatest height. He was perhaps the most learned man and the most able statesman of his age. He wrote "Letters," and other works, which are highly commended. Died in 1216, and was succeeded by Honorius III.

See F. HURTER, "Geschichte Innocenz III.," 2 vols., 1835, (and French version of the same, 4 vols., 1838-43;) D. Innocent IV., (SINIBALDO de' Fieschi—dà fe-ĕs'-kee,) a native of Genoa, was elected pope as successor to Celestine IV. in 1243. He soon found himself involved in a quarrel with the emperor Frederick II., (who had been excommunicated by Gregory IX.,) and retired for security to Lyons. Here he summoned a council, in 1245, and renewed the excommunication of Frederick, who was also formally deposed. The emperor, however, refused to submit to this assumption, and waged war against the pope for several years, until his death in 1250. Innocent then returned to his capital, and proclaimed a crusade against Conrad, the son of Frederick; but again his malignity was baffled. He died in 1254, and was succeeded by Alexander IV.

See J. HARTMANN, "Vita Innocentii IV.," 1738; PAOLO PANZA, "Vita del gran Pontefice Innocenzio Quarto," 1601.

Innocent V., (PETER OF TARANTASIA,) born at Moutier, in Savoy, was elected in 1276 as successor to Gregory X. After holding office a few months, he died in the same year.

Innocent VI., (ÉTIENNE Aubert—ō'bair',) a Frenchman, born near Pompadour, was elected pope in 1352. He succeeded Clement VI., who had made him a cardinal and Bishop of Ostia. His court was kept at Avignon throughout his pontificate. He reformed some abuses in the Church, and appears to have acted with more moderation and propriety than most of his predecessors. Died in 1362.

See BRUYS, "Histoire des Papes," 1735; SISMONDI, "Histoire des Français."

Innocent VII., (Cardinal COSMO Migliorati—mēl'-yo-rā'tee,) born at Sulmona about 1338, was elected pope in 1404, as successor to Boniface IX. At that time there was an extensive schism in the Church, and Benedict XIII. held a rival court at Avignon. Died in 1406.

See PLATINA, "Vite de' summi Pontefici," 1613.

Innocent VIII., (GIOVANNI BATTISTA Cibo—chee'-bo,) born at Genoa in 1434, was elected pope in 1484, as successor to Sixtus IV. He laboured without success to unite the sovereigns of Europe against the Turks, and was himself engaged in war with Ferdinand, King of Naples. He died in 1491, and was succeeded by Alexander VI.

See F. SERDONATI, "Vita d'Innocenzo VIII.," 1829; F. M. VIALARDO, "Istoria della Vita d'Innocenzo VIII.," 1613.

Innocent IX., (ANTONIO Facchinetti—fäk-ke-net'tee,) born at Bologna, succeeded Gregory XIV. in October, 1591, but only survived two months after his election. He left a good reputation for virtue and wisdom. Clement VIII. was his successor.

See RANKE, "History of the Popes."

Innocent X., (GIOVANNI BATTISTA Panfili—pän-fee'lee,) elected in place of Urban VIII. in 1644, was born in Rome about 1570. He owed his promotion to the Barberini, who soon became his enemies. The Jansenist controversy having made a great commotion in the Church, Innocent appointed a commission of cardinals to settle it, and in 1653 issued a bull cum occasione, in which he condemned the five propositions of Jansen. Historians differ widely as to the character of this pontiff. He died in 1655, and was succeeded by Alexander VII.

See RANKE, "History of the Popes:" CIACONIUS, "Vitæ et Res gestæ Pontificum Romanorum," 4 vols., 1677.

Innocent XI., (Cardinal BENEDICT Odescalchi—o-dĕs-kāl'kee,) born at Como in 1611, succeeded Clement X. in 1676. He had been made a cardinal in 1647, and had sustained a respectable character. He soon manifested his zeal to reform abuses and restore strict discipline, and his inflexible resolution to maintain the papal prerogatives. His pontificate was signalized by a remarkable contest with Louis XIV. of France in relation to the régale and the privileges or exemptions of foreign ambassadors at Rome. The pope wished to abolish the usage which rendered the ambassador's palace, with the adjacent premises, an asylum for malefactors, etc., inaccessible to the officers of justice. Louis XIV. in 1687 sent his ambassador Lavardin with orders to maintain his rights, and with an armed retinue of eight hundred men. The pope persisted, and excommunicated Lavardin, who returned without effecting his object; and the quarrel was not ended until after the death of Innocent, which occurred in 1689. It seems that his enmity to Louis induced this pontiff to favour the English in resistance to James II.; and some one remarked that the peace of Europe would be promoted if James would become a Protestant, and the pope a Catholic.

Innocent XII., (ANTONIO Pignatelli—pēn-yā-tel'-lee,) born in Naples in 1615, became Cardinal and Archbishop of Naples during the pontificate of Innocent XI., and succeeded Alexander VIII. as pope in July, 1692. He proposed to take Innocent XI. as his model, and appears to deserve credit for his economy, regular habits, liberality, and works of utility. In his pontificate a reconciliation was effected with the French court by mutual concession. Quietism also received its quietus, in 1699, by a papal brief condemning Fénelon's "Maximes des Saints." He died in 1700, and was succeeded by Clement XI.

See RANKE, "History of the Popes;" BRUYS, "Histoire des Papes," 1735.

Innocent XIII., (MICHELANGELO Conti—kon'tee,) born in Rome in 1655, was the son of the Duke of Poli, and attained the dignity of cardinal in 1706. He succeeded Clement XI. as pope in 1721, and exercised his power so prudently that his subjects regretted the brevity of its duration. He died in 1724, and his place was supplied by Benedict XIII.

I'no, [Gr. Ἰνώ,] a daughter of Cadmus and Harmonia, was the wife of Athamas, King of Thebes. According to tradition, she incurred the enmity of Juno, who deprived Athamas of his reason. In a fit of insanity he killed a son of Ino, who threw herself into the sea and was changed into a sea-goddess, named Leucothea. Her story was dramatized by several Greek poets.

Inocencio. See INNOCENT.

In'skip, (JOHN S.,) a Methodist preacher, born at Huntingdon, England, August 10, 1816, was brought to the United States when five years old, began a religious life in 1832, and in 1835 commenced to preach. He acquired great note as a conductor of camp-meetings, and became editor of the "Christian Standard." Died at Ocean Grove, New Jersey, March 7, 1884.

Interiano de Ayala, ēn-tā-re-ā'no dā ī-ā'lā, (JUAN,) a Spanish author and monk, born in 1656, became preacher to the king. He published, besides other works, (mostly in Spanish,) "Pictor Christianus Eruditus," (1730,) in which he exposes the prevalent errors of painters who treat of religious subjects. His style is pure and elegant. Died in 1730.

Inthiema, in-te-ā'mā, (HERO,) a Dutch poet and jurist, born in 1576; died in 1623.

Intieri, ēn-te-ā'ree, (BARTOLOMMEO,) an Italian economist and mechanician, born at Pistoia about 1674. He founded a chair of political economy at Naples, and wrote "On the Conservation of Grain." Died in 1757.

Intorcetta, ēn-tor-chet'tā, (PROSPERO,) a Jesuit missionary, born in Sicily in 1625, laboured in China, and published Latin translations of some works of Confucius. Died in 1696.

Inveges, ēn-vā'jēs, (AUGUSTIN,) a Sicilian historian and ecclesiastic, born at Sciacca in 1595, published a "History of Palermo," (3 vols., 1649–51,) which was much esteemed. Died in 1677.

In'wood, (CHARLES FREDERICK,) son of William Inwood, noticed below, was born in 1798. He co-operated with his father as architect of Westminster Hospital and other edifices. Died in 1840.

Inwood, (HENRY WILLIAM,) an English architect, a brother of the preceding, was born in 1794. He was associated in his profession with his father, and published "Studies of the Architect from Nature," and an illustrated work on Athenian architecture, called "The Erechtheion at Athens," (1827.) He perished by shipwreck in 1843, while making a voyage to Spain.

Inwood, (WILLIAM,) an English architect, born about 1770, was employed on many buildings in London, and also followed the profession of surveyor. He was assisted in his architectural labours by his two sons, noticed above. Saint Pancras Church, London, finished in 1822, was erected by him and his son Henry. He published "Tables for Purchasing Estates," etc. Died in 1843.

I'o, [Gr. Ἰώ,] a fabulous personage, whom the Greek poets represent as a daughter of Inachus and a priestess of Juno. It was said that, having been transformed by Jupiter into a white cow, she was tormented by a gadfly, (sent by Juno,) to escape from which she swam across the Ionian Sea and wandered through various parts of the world. Her story is related by Æschylus in his "Suppliants."

I-ọ-lā'us [Gr. Ἰόλαος] or I'ọ-las, [Gr. Ἰόλας,] a personage of classic mythology, was a relative and faithful companion of Hercules, whom he aided in his contest against the Lernean Hydra.

I'o-le, [Gr. Ἰόλη,] the daughter of Eurytus, King of Œchalia, who promised her in marriage to Hercules. But, Eurytus having afterwards refused to perform his engagement, Iole was forcibly carried off by her lover. On the death of the latter, caused by Dejanira's jealousy, (see DEJANIRA,) Iole was married to Hyllus, the son of Hercules.

I'on, [Gr. Ἰων,] the mythical ancestor of the Ionians, was supposed to be the son of Apollo and Creusa. His story was dramatized by Euripides.

Ion, [Ἰων,] a Greek tragic poet, who was born at Chios, (Scio,) and flourished about 450 B.C. He lived at Athens, where he became a friend of Æschylus and gained a prize for one of his tragedies. He composed, besides tragedies, elegies, lyric poems, and some prose works, all of which are lost. He was included in the canon of the five Athenian tragic poets by the Alexandrian critics.

See FABRICIUS, "Bibliotheca Græca;" KAYSER, "Historia critica Tragicorum Græcorum," 1845; KARL NIEBERDING, "De Ionis Chii Vita, Moribus et Studiis," 1836.

I'ọ-phon, [Gr. Ἰοφῶν,] an Athenian tragic poet, a son of Sophocles the poet, lived about 420 B.C. He gained the second prize in 429, when Euripides received the first prize. Among the titles of his plays are "Achilles," "Actæon," and "Pentheus." His works are not extant. Died after 405 B.C.

Iphicrate. See IPHICRATES.

I-phic'ra-tēs, [Gr. Ἰφικράτης; Fr. IPHICRATE, e'fe krăt',] a skilful Athenian general, who rose from a humble rank in society and obtained the chief command of the Athenian army. About 392 B.C. he defeated the Spartans near Corinth, and afterwards gained applause by his defence of Corcyra against the Spartans and Syracusans. He made important changes in the armour and tactics of his troops, by exchanging the heavy buckler for a light target and increasing the length of the spear and the sword. He was associated with Timotheus and Chares in the command of an expedition against Byzantium about 357 B.C.

Iph-ĭ-ġe-nī'a or Iph-ĭ-ġe-neī'a, [Gr. Ἰφίγενεια; Fr. IPHIGÉNIE, ē'fe'zhā'ne',] a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. The ancient poets relate that Diana detained the Greek fleet at Aulis by a calm, because Agamemnon had offended her, and that the soothsayer Calchas declared Diana could be appeased only by the sacrifice of Iphigenia. When she was on the point of being immolated, she was rescued, it is said, by Diana, who carried her to Tauris, where she became a priestess in the temple of the goddess. Her story is the subject of two of the dramas of Euripides.

Iphigénie. See IPHIGENIA.

Iph'ĭ-tus, [Gr. Ἴφιτος,] a king of Elis, who revived the Olympic games about 884 B.C., four hundred and seventy years after their first institution. They were celebrated every fifth year, at Olympia, on the banks of the Alpheus. Lycurgus, the Spartan lawgiver, was associated with Iphitus in this affair.

Irailh, e'rāl', (AUGUSTIN SIMON,) a French historical writer, born at Puy-en-Velay in 1719, became canon of Monistrol. He wrote an interesting work entitled "Literary Quarrels, or Memoirs of the Revolutions in the Republic of Letters from the Time of Homer to the Present," (4 vols., 1761,) also a "History of the Reunion of Bretagne with France," (2 vols., 1764.) Died in 1794.

See QUÉRARD, "La France Littéraire."

Irala Yuso, e-rā'lā yoo'so, (MATIAS ANTONIO,) a Spanish painter and engraver, born at Madrid in 1680; died in 1753.

Ir'by, (CHARLES LEONARD,) an English officer in the royal navy, was born October 9, 1789. In conjunction with James Mangles, he wrote a valuable work entitled "Travels in Egypt, Nubia, Syria, and the Holy Land," (1823.) Died December 3, 1845. (See MANGLES, CAPTAIN.)

Irby, (FREDERICK PAUL,) a British naval officer, born in 1779, commanded the Amelia in an indecisive action against the French in 1813. Died in 1844.

Ire'dell, (īr'del,) (JAMES,) a distinguished jurist, born in England in 1751, settled in North Carolina in 1768. He was admitted to the bar in 1770, and in 1777 became judge of the supreme court of North Carolina. This position he resigned in 1779. He was one of the ablest and most influential members of the convention called in 1788 to consider the Federal Constitution, and from 1790 till his death, in 1799, was judge of the supreme court of the United States. He published, under the authority of the legislature, the "Laws of North Carolina, 1715–1790," (1791.)

See G. J. MCREE, "Life of James Iredell," 1857.

Iredell, (JAMES,) a lawyer, a son of the preceding, was born at Edenton, North Carolina, in 1788. He was Governor of North Carolina in 1827, and was a Senator of the United States from 1828 to 1831. He was subsequently reporter to the supreme court of his native State, and published thirteen volumes of law and eight of equity reports. Died in 1853.

Ire'land, (JOHN,) D.D., an English writer, born at Ashburton in 1761, became prebendary of Westminster in 1802, and Dean of Westminster and rector of Islip in 1816. He founded a professorship at Oxford, and several scholarships. He was a contributor to the "London Quarterly Review," and the author of several approved works of divinity, among which is "Paganism and Christianity Compared." Died in 1842.

Ireland, (JOHN,) an English writer, born in Shropshire, removed to London, where he became a connoisseur of art and a dealer in pictures. He compiled "Memoirs of Henderson" the actor, and published "Hogarth Illustrated," which was favourably received. Died in 1808.

Ireland, (SAMUEL,) born in London, was a weaver of Spitalfields in his youth. He became subsequently a dealer in rare prints, curiosities, etc. Having acquired some skill in drawing and engraving, he employed it in illustrating various countries, of which he published "Picturesque Tours." He was the author of "Graphic Illustrations of Hogarth," and the publisher of the Shakspeare Papers forged by his son. (See below.) Died in 1800.

Ireland, (WILLIAM HENRY,) a son of the preceding, was born in London in 1777. He acquired notoriety in 1795 by forging legal documents under the seal of Shakspeare, and by practising on the public credulity in relation to dramas which he pretended to have found at Stratford. One of these, called "Vortigern," was purchased by Sheridan, and performed at Drury Lane before the imposture was detected. The audience were extremely disgusted at the quality of the play, and Ireland, being required to explain how he had obtained it, confessed the forgery to his father, and afterwards published a written confession, which displays more vanity than penitence. Died in 1835.

Irenæus, e-rā-nā'ŭs, (FALKOVSKI,) a learned Russian prelate and writer on theology, born in 1762; died in 1823.

Irenæus, (KLEMENTIEVSKI,) a Russian theologian, born in 1753, became Archbishop of Pskof. He wrote commentaries on Scripture, and translated from the Greek some works of the Fathers. Died in 1818.

Irenæus, īr-e-nee'us, [Gr. Εἰρηναῖος; Fr. IRÉNÉE, e'rā'nā'; It. IRENEO, e-rā-nā'o,] SAINT, a Christian martyr, born about 130 or 140 A.D., was a Greek by birth, and was probably a native of Asia Minor, as he was a pupil of the eminent Bishop Polycarp of Smyrna. About 177 he became Bishop of Lyons, (Lugdunum,) in France, in place of Pothinus, who was the first that occupied that see. He ministered to his churches with wisdom and general acceptance. To counteract the errors of the Gnostics and others, he wrote a treatise against Heresies, which is still extant, (in a Latin translation.) He also wrote several Letters, and other works, which are lost, except some fragments. It is generally supposed that he suffered martyrdom under Septimus Severus; but the learned are not agreed whether it occurred in 202 or 208. He was well versed in ancient philosophy, as well as in evangelical doctrine. His book on Heresies is highly appreciated as a historical monument and a vindication of the primitive faith. He was a believer in the Millennium, and entertained opinions on that subject which some consider extravagant.

I-re'ne, [Gr. Εἰρήνη; Fr. IRÈNE, e'rĕn',] Empress of Constantinople, was born at Athens about 752, of very obscure parentage, and in 769 A.D. became the wife of Leo IV., Emperor of the East. At his death, in 780, he left a son of ten years, named Constantine, during whose minority Irene acted as regent. She was remarkable for her beauty, energy, and talents. In order to decide the quarrel between the Iconoclasts and their opponents, to whom she was partial, she assembled a council in 787, which formally sanctioned the worship of images. When her son attained his majority, her ambition so far prevailed over natural affection that she dethroned him and deprived him of sight. In 802 she was deposed by a conspiracy of her subjects, and Nicephorus was chosen emperor. She died in exile in 803.

Ireton, īr'tŏn, (HENRY,) an eminent English republican, born in 1610. He was a student of law when the civil war began, in which he became an ardent leader of the popular cause. Entering the army as captain of cavalry, he was rapidly promoted, and became highly distinguished for his courage and capacity both in the battle-field and the council-chamber. At the battle of Naseby, (1645,) with the rank of commissary-general, he commanded the left wing, and was wounded and taken prisoner; but, his friends having gained the victory, he recovered his liberty the same day. In 1646 he married Bridget, daughter of Oliver Cromwell. The latter, as Hume remarks, "had great deference for the counsels of Ireton;" and the republicans generally reposed the highest confidence in him, as a statesman of incorruptible honour. About 1646 he was elected to Parliament, where he projected various wise legal and constitutional reforms and was eminent for his skill in drafting ordinances. While Charles I. was a prisoner at Hampton Court, he had conferences with Cromwell and Ireton, who, it is said, were inclined to reinstate him in a limited royalty, until they intercepted one of his letters which convinced them of his insincerity. Ireton was a member of the court which tried the king; and he signed the warrant for his execution, January, 1649. In reference to this affair, Burnet says, "Ireton was the person that drove it on; for Cromwell was all the while in some suspense about it." In July, 1649, he went to Ireland as second in command under Cromwell, who, returning after the lapse of a few months, left to Ireton the chief command, with the title of lord deputy. After gaining several victories and taking Limerick, he died there of the plague in 1651. Hume, who was not partial to his cause, denominates him "a memorable personage, much celebrated for his vigilance, industry, capacity even for the strict execution of justice in that unlimited command which he possessed in Ireland. It was believed by many that he was animated by a sincere and passionate love of liberty." ("History of England.")

Iriarte or Yriarte, e-re-aR'tà, (BERNARDO,) nephew of Don Juan de Iriarte, noticed below, was born in Teneriffe about 1734. He became a member of the council of state, and held other important offices under the Spanish government. Died in 1814.

Iriarte, (DOMINGO,) brother of the preceding, born in Teneriffe in 1746, was sent as minister plenipotentiary of Spain to Poland, and employed in other embassies. Died in 1795.

Iriarte, (FRANCISCO DIEGO DE Ainsay—īn-sī',) a Spanish writer, born at Huesca, published an account of his native city, entitled "Fundacion, Eccelencias, Grandezas, etc. de la antiquisima Ciudad de Huesca," (1619.)

Iriarte, (IGNACIO,) a celebrated Spanish landscape-painter, born in Guipuscoa in 1620, was a pupil of the elder Herrera. He worked in Seville, and became a friend of Murillo, who painted the figures for some of his landscapes. He was one of the founders of the Academy of Seville. Iriarte was regarded as the best landscape-painter of his country and his time. Connoisseurs admire in his works the lightness of the foliage, the transparency of the sky, the limpidity of the water, and the mastery of chiaroscuro. Died in 1685.

Iriarte, de, dà e-re-aR'tà, (Don JUAN,) an eminent linguist and scholar, born in the island of Teneriffe in 1702. He studied in Paris at the College of Louis le Grand, and subsequently visited London and Madrid, where he was appointed in 1732 one of the librarians in the Royal Library. He became official translator to the principal secretary of state in 1740, and in 1743 was elected a member of the Royal Academy. Among his works may be named a "History of the Canary Islands," (in manuscript,) a collection of Spanish proverbs in Latin verse, and translations from Martial. Iriarte is said to have added two thousand manuscripts and more than ten thousand printed volumes to the Royal Library during the thirty-nine years in which he officiated as librarian. Died in 1771.

Iriarte, de, (TOMAS,) youngest brother of Bernardo, noticed above, was born in Teneriffe about 1750. He became a proficient in the ancient and modern languages under the tuition of his uncle, and subsequently became archivist to the principal secretary of state, and editor of the "Madrid Mercury." He was author of a poem entitled "La Musica," (1779,) which was received with great favour and translated into the principal European languages, and "Literary Fables," ("Fabulas literarias.") The latter are written in various metres, and are remarkable for their graceful versification. They enjoyed great popularity at the time, and are still ranked among the classics of the language. An English version of these fables, by George H. Devereux, appeared in 1855. Iriarte also published a comedy entitled "The Spoiled Child," ("El Señorito mimado,") a number of sonnets and critical essays, and a metrical translation of Horace's "Art of Poetry." Died about 1790.

Irico, e-ree'kō, (GIOVANNI ANDREA,) an Italian priest and savant, born at Trino in 1704. He wrote several religious and antiquarian works. Died in 1782.

I'ris, [Gr. Ἶρις,] in Greek mythology, the goddess of the rainbow, said to be a daughter of Thaumas, and sometimes called Thaumantias. Homer represents her as the messenger of the gods, employed to carry messages from Ida to Olympus and from gods to men. She was the attendant of the goddess Hera, or Juno.

Irland, ĕR'lôN', (BONAVENTURE,) a French jurist, of Scottish descent, born at Poitiers in 1551; died in 1612.

Irnerius, ĕR-nā're-us, sometimes written Warnerius, a celebrated Italian jurisconsult, born at Bologna in the eleventh century. He became the renovator or restorer of the Roman law, which had been neglected, and on which he wrote commentaries, called "Glossæ." He obtained the office of judge, and was sent by the emperor to Rome in 1118 to expedite the election of a pope.

I'ronṣ, (WILLIAM JOSIAH,) D.D., an English author, born at Hoddesdon, Herts, September 12, 1812. He graduated at Queen's College, Oxford, in 1833, became a prebendary of Saint Paul's in 1860, and in 1870 rural dean, rector of Wadingham, and Bampton Lecturer. He published various theological and philosophical works, and made a noted translation of the "Dies Iræ." Died June 18, 1883.

Ir'vine, (WILLIAM,) a general, born near Enniskillen, Ireland, about 1742, emigrated to Pennsylvania in 1763. He became a colonel in 1776, and a brigadier-general in 1779. From 1781 to 1783 he commanded the troops stationed at Fort Pitt for the defence of the western frontier. He was chosen a member of Congress in 1787, and again in 1793. Died in 1804.

Ir'ving, (DAVID,) LL.D., a Scottish biographer and writer on law. He published "Lives of Scottish Poets," (1804,) "Lives of the Scottish Writers," (1839,) and "The Table-Talk of John Selden," (1854.) He was born at Langholm, December 5, 1778; died at Edinburgh, March 10, 1860.

Irving, (EDWARD,) a celebrated and eloquent Scottish pulpit orator, born at Annan in 1792, was a graduate of the University of Edinburgh. Having been employed as rector of an academy at Kirkaldy about seven years, he was ordained a Presbyterian minister. From 1819 to 1822 he was engaged as assistant in the pulpit of Dr. Chalmers, Glasgow, where he acquired a good reputation. He accepted a call from the Scottish Church, Cross Street, London, in 1822, and soon became an admired and fashionable preacher. His original genius and his extraordinary eloquence attracted crowded audiences, among whom were found the most eminent authors and statesmen, and nobles of the highest rank. In 1823 he published a series of discourses entitled "For the Oracles of God, Four Orations," etc. In 1829 he removed into a larger church built for him in Regent Square. A charge of heresy having been preferred against him in the presbytery of London in 1830, he was condemned by that body, and ejected from the church, in 1832. After this event he obtained another place, and attracted crowds by his exhibition of the gift of unknown tongues, which he ascribed to divine inspiration. He published "Babylon and Infidelity Foredoomed of God," and other theological treatises. Died at Glasgow in December, 1834. "He was unquestionably," says De Quincey, "by many degrees the greatest orator of our times." It is probable that his devotion was sincere, but not guided by discretion, and that in the latter part of his career his mind was affected with insanity. Carlyle, who was his friend, thinks that "bodily and spiritually, perhaps, there was not (in that November, 1822) a man more full of genial, energetic life in these islands." He left three children. The collected writings of Edward Irving have been published under the editorship of his nephew, the Rev. G. Carlyle, London, 1864–65.

Irving, (JOHN HENRY BRODRIBB,) an English actor, whose family name is Brodribb, was born at Keinton, in Somersetshire, February 6, 1838. He first appeared on the stage in 1856, and rapidly attained distinction as a first-rate comedian. His "Hamlet," first played in 1874, greatly divided public opinion, but at present his high rank as a tragedian is very generally conceded. In 1883 and in 1884–85 he visited the United States.

Ir'ving, (JOHN TREAT,) an American judge and writer, brother of Washington Irving, was born in 1778. He was a popular contributor, (political,) both in prose and verse, to the "Morning Chronicle," and from 1821 till his death, in 1838, was presiding judge of the court of common pleas in New York.

Irving, (JOHN TREAT,) an American lawyer and writer, son of the preceding, and a resident of New York, is author of a volume of "Indian Sketches," (1835,) and two novels, entitled "The Attorney," and "Harry Harson; or, The Benevolent Bachelor," which originally appeared in the "Knickerbocker Magazine."

Irving, (JOSEPH,) a Scottish author, born at Dumfries in 1830. He wrote a "Book of Dumbartonshire," (3 vols., 1879,) "Annals of Our Time," "Dictionary of Scotsmen," (1880,) etc. Died in 1891.

Irving, (PETER,) an American journalist, born in 1771. He became in 1802 the editor and proprietor of the "Morning Chronicle," a Democratic journal of New York. In conjunction with his brother Washington, he projected "Knickerbocker's History of New York." He wrote "Giovanni Sbogarro, a Venetian Tale," (1820.) Died in 1838.

Irving, (THEODORE,) LL.D., an American author, and minister in the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in New York in 1809. He spent some time in Europe with his uncle, Washington Irving, was professor of history and belles-lettres in Geneva College, New York, from 1836 to 1849, and afterwards filled for several years the chair of belles-lettres in the New York Free Academy. He entered the ministry in 1854. He wrote "The Conquest of Florida by Hernando de Soto," in 2 vols., (Philadelphia and London, 1835,) and "The Fountain of Living Waters," (1854.) Died December 20, 1880.

Irving, (WASHINGTON,) a distinguished American author and humourist, born in the city of New York, April 3, 1783, was a son of William Irving, a native of Scotland. About 1800 he left school and commenced the study of the law. For the benefit of his health, he performed in 1804 a voyage to Europe, visited France, Italy, Switzerland, and England, and returned in 1806. Soon after his return he was admitted to the bar; but he preferred to devote himself to literary pursuits, and never practised law. In conjunction with his brother William and with James K. Paulding, he issued in 1807 a humorous and satirical magazine, entitled "Salmagundi, or the Whim-Whams and Opinions of Launcelot Langstaff, Esq., and others." Of this amusing and popular work only twenty numbers were issued. He published in 1809 another humorous work, "The History of New York, by Diedrich Knickerbocker," in which he was assisted by his brother Peter. It was very favourably received. "I have never," says Sir Walter Scott, "read anything so closely resembling the style of Dean Swift as the Annals of Diedrich Knickerbocker." (Letter to Henry Brevoort, April 23, 1813.)

In 1810 he became a silent partner with his brothers in an extensive commercial house in New York. He sailed in 1815 to Europe, where he remained many years, and in 1817 visited Sir Walter Scott at Abbotsford, who became his constant friend. He was reduced to poverty by the failure of the firm of which he was a member, in 1817. His next important work was "The Sketch-Book," (1818,) by Geoffrey Crayon, which was written in England. It enjoyed great popularity, and raised Irving to the highest rank of American authors. Lord Jeffrey, in the "Edinburgh Review" for August, 1820, commended "The Sketch-Book" as "written throughout with the greatest care and accuracy, and worked up to great purity and beauty of diction on the model of the most elegant and polished of our native writers." He published in London, in 1822, "Bracebridge Hall, or the Humourists," which was received with great favour both in England and America. Commenting on this work, Lord Jeffrey says, "We happen to be very intense and sensitive admirers of those soft harmonies of studied speech in which this author is apt to indulge himself, and have caught ourselves oftener than we shall confess, neglecting his excellent matter to lap ourselves in the liquid music of his periods." ("Edinburgh Review" for November, 1822.) For his "Tales of a Traveller," (1824,) Murray, the London publisher, gave him £1500 before he saw the manuscript.

Mr. Irving afterwards spent some years in France and Spain, where he composed his "History of the Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus," (4 vols., 1828,) which was very successful. "This is one of those works," says Alexander H. Everett, "which are at the same time the delight of readers and the despair of critics. It is as nearly perfect as any work well can be." ("North American Review" for January, 1829.) In 1829 he produced an imaginative and romantic work entitled "The Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada, from the Manuscripts of Fray Antonio Agapida." He was appointed secretary of legation to the American embassy at London in 1829, and returned to the United States in 1832. Among his later works are "The Alhambra," (1832;) a "Tour on the Prairies," (1835;) "Astoria," (3 vols., 1836;) "The Adventures of Captain Bonneville," (2 vols., 1837;) "Oliver Goldsmith, a Biography," (1849;) "Mahomet and his Successors," (1850;) and "The Life of George Washington," (5 vols., 1855–59.) He was minister to Spain from 1842 to 1846. He passed the latter part of his life at Sunnyside, on the Hudson River, where he died, November 28, 1859. He was never married.

For an easy elegance of style, Irving has no superior, perhaps no equal, among the prose writers of America. If Hawthorne excels him in variety, in earnestness, and in force, he is perhaps inferior to Irving in facility and grace; while he can make no claim to that genial, lambent humour which beams in almost every page of "Geoffrey Crayon."

Irving, (WILLIAM,) a brother of the preceding, was born in New York in 1766. He married a sister of James K. Paulding in 1793, became a merchant in New York, and was a member of Congress during three terms, (1813–19.) He aided his brother and Mr. Paulding in the "Salmagundi," of which he wrote the poetical parts. Died in 1821.

Ir'win, (EYLES,) a poet, born in Calcutta, of Irish parents, in 1748, was employed in the civil service of the East India Company. He wrote several odes and eclogues, and "Adventures during a Voyage up the Red Sea," (1780.) Died in 1817.

Isaac, ī'zak, [Heb. יִצְחָק or יִשְׂחָק; It. ISACCO, e-sȧk'-ko; Arabian, ISHÂK, is'hȧk',] a Hebrew patriarch, the son of Abraham and Sarah, was born about 1990 B.C. He married Rebecca, and became the father of Esau and Jacob. "Of all the patriarchs," says Bishop Hall, "none made so little noise in the world as Isaac." He removed to Gerar, in the land of the Philistines, and acquired riches as a planter. He died at the age of one hundred and eighty.

Isaac I., or Isaac Com-ne'nus, [Gr. Ἰσαάκιος ὁ Κομνηνός,] Emperor of Constantinople, was chosen by the army as successor of Michael VI. in 1057. Two years later, in consequence of a malady which he supposed mortal, he resigned the throne to Constantine Ducas, and entered a convent. Died in 1061.

Isaac II., or Isaac An'ge-lus, [Gr. Ἰσαάκιος ὁ Ἄγγελος,] Emperor of Constantinople, was proclaimed in 1185 as successor to Androni'cus, who was dethroned by a popular revolt. He rendered himself very unpopular by his vices and misgovernment. In 1195 his brother Alexis usurped the throne and imprisoned Isaac, who was liberated and restored in 1203 by an army of crusaders. In 1204 he was again supplanted by Alexius Ducas, and died or was killed the same year. Constantinople was speedily taken by the crusaders, who elected Baldwin emperor.

Isaac, ee'zăk, (HEINRICH,) a German musician, whom the Italians called ARRIGO TEDESCO, (i.e. the "German Henry,") was born about 1440. He removed to Italy about 1475, and was patronized by Lorenzo de' Medici. He composed sacred music.

Isaacson, ī'zăk-son, (HENRY,) born in London in 1581, wrote a work on Chronology. Died in 1654.

Is'a-bel [Sp. pron. e-sȧ-bĕl'] II., (or, more fully, Maria Isabel Luisa,) Queen of Spain, born at Madrid in October, 1830, is a daughter of Ferdinand VII. and Maria Christina. She succeeded her father on the 29th of September, 1833, when her mother became regent. Her claim was disputed by her uncle, Don Carlos, in a civil war, which ended in the defeat of the Carlists in 1840. The queen-regent having been driven from power by a popular revolt in October, 1840, Espartero became regent. Isabel was declared of age in November, 1843, and in October, 1846, was married to her cousin, Francisco de Assis, a son of Francisco de Paula, who was a brother of Ferdinand VII. Her reign was agitated by many revolutions, coups d'état, and changes of constitution. In September, 1868, she was deposed by her revolted subjects almost without a struggle. Her son, Alfonso XII., became king in 1875.

Is-a-bel'la OF AUSTRIA, (CLARA EUGENIA,) the daughter of Philip II. of Spain and Elizabeth of France, was born in 1566. As the niece of Henry III. of France, she claimed the French crown at his death, but was excluded by the Salic law, though she was favoured by the chiefs of the League. In 1597 she became the wife of Archduke Albert, son of the Emperor of Germany. Died in 1633.

Isabella OF BAVARIA, daughter of Stephen, second Duke of Bavaria, born in 1371, became Queen of France in 1385 by marriage with Charles VI. She was remarkable for beauty and for her voluptuous and dissolute character. When her imbecile consort became incapable of ruling, she aspired to royal power, and made a coalition with the English against the dauphin, her son. Died in 1435.

Isabella [Span. ISABEL, e-sȧ-bĕl'; Fr. ISABELLE, e'zȧ'-bĕl'] OF CASTILE, daughter of John II., King of Castile, was born at Madrigal in 1451. The malcontent subjects of her brother, Henry IV., forced him to acknowledge her as his heir, after which her hand was solicited by several princes of Europe, and she became the wife of Ferdinand of Aragon in 1469. In 1474 she was proclaimed Queen of Castile and Leon, the sovereignty of which she did not resign to her husband, but kept in her own hands. Historians agree in applauding her beauty, virtue, magnanimity, piety, learning, and political wisdom. It was under her auspices that Columbus discovered America, after his project had been treated with neglect by Ferdinand. Died in 1504. (See FERDINAND V.) Isabella had blue eyes and auburn hair, and possessed great beauty of features, sweetness of expression, and dignity of presence.

Isabelle OF FRANCE. See ELIZABETH OF FRANCE.

Isabelle (ē'zȧ'bĕl') OF FRANCE, Queen of England daughter of Philip the Fair, King of France, was born in 1292, and was married to Edward II. in 1308. The issue of this union was a son, who became Edward III. About 1324 she went to Paris to negotiate between her consort and the French king, where she formed a conspiracy with malcontent nobles, and returned to England with the avowed intention to remove from power the king's unworthy favourite, Spencer. Entering London without resistance, in 1326, the partisans of the queen deposed Edward II. and proclaimed his son king. Isabelle and her favourite, Mortimer, exercised the royal power a few years during the minority of her son; and there seems no reason to doubt that they contrived the murder of Edward II. She was imprisoned for nearly twenty years, and died in prison in 1358. She was surnamed, on account of her cruelty, "the she-wolf of France."

Isabelle OF FRANCE, Queen of England, born in 1389, was a daughter of Charles VI. She was married to Richard II. of England in 1396. Died in 1409.

Isabelle, ē'zȧ'bĕl', (CHARLES ÉDOUARD,) a French architect, born at Havre in 1800, wrote "The Circular Edifices and Domes Classed," etc., Died May 1, 1880.

Isabelle d'Angoulême, e'zȧ'bĕl' dôN'goo'lĕm', a French princess, was a daughter of Aymar, Count of Angoulême. She was married to John, King of England, in 1201. Died in 1245.

Isabey, e'zȧ'bȧ', (EUGÈNE LOUIS GABRIEL,) an eminent painter of marine views, born in Paris in 1804. He obtained a first-class medal in 1824, and produced "The Coast of Honfleur" and a "Tempest near Dieppe" in 1827, the "Battle of the Texel," (1839,) "The Departure of Queen Victoria," (1845,) and the "Embarkation of De Ruyter," (1851.) He received a first-class medal at the Exposition of 1855. Died in 1886.

Isabey, (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a celebrated French miniature-painter, born at Nancy in 1767, was a pupil of David, and father of the preceding. About 1802 he became the most fashionable artist of Paris in his department of the art. He was liberally patronized by the emperor Napoleon, who had been his friend when both were obscure citizens. He executed many admired portraits of the Bonaparte family and of the generals of the empire. It is said that most of the sovereigns of Europe have been the subjects of his pencil. Among his works are the "Table des Maréchaux," a picture on porcelain of Napoleon and his marshals, and "The Congress of Vienna," (1817.) Died in 1855.

Isacs, ee'zăks, (PIETER,) a skilful Dutch portrait-painter, born at Helzevor in 1569; died about 1620.

Isæus, ī-see'us, [Gr. Ἰσαῖος; Fr. ISÉE, e'zȧ',] a famous Greek orator, who flourished about 400 B.C., was a native of Chalcis, or, according to some authorities, of Athens. Having been a pupil of Isocrates, he opened a celebrated school in Athens, and had the honour of being the preceptor of Demosthenes. Isæus is one of the ten Athenian orators of the Alexandrian canon. His style is at once elegant and vehement, but is less natural than that of Lysias. He had great skill in dialectics and in the distribution of his arguments. Only eleven of his orations are now extant; and these are all forensic. He is said to have survived the accession of King Philip of Macedon, 348 B.C.

See J. A. LIEBMANN, "De Isæi Vita et Scriptis," 1831; E. JENIKE, "Observationes in Isæum," 1838.

Isæus, a Greek sophist and orator, born in Assyria, lived in the first century after Christ. His eloquence is extolled by Pliny.

Isaiah, ī-zā'yah or e-zī'ą, [Heb. יְשַׁעְיָהוּ; Gr. Ἡσαΐας; Lat. ESAI'AS; Fr. ISAÏE, e'zȧ'e', or ÉSAÏE, ā'zȧ'e'; It. ISAIA, e-sȧ-ee'ȧ; Sp. ISAIAS, e-sȧ-ee'ȧs,] the first of the great Hebrew prophets, was a contemporary of Hosea, Joel, Amos, and Micah. He prophesied during a period of about fifty years, beginning about 760 B.C. He lived at Jerusalem, and exerted great influence in public affairs.

Little is known of his personal history, except that he had a wife, who is called a prophetess, and two sons. There is a doubtful tradition that Isaiah suffered death by being sawn asunder, at the command of King Manasseh. As a writer he is remarkable for versatility of genius, and merits the first rank among the prophets by the majestic simplicity and sublimity of his compositions. He declared more amply and clearly than any other prophet the eternal divinity, vicarious sufferings, and glorious kingdom of the Messiah, and hence is often called the evangelical prophet. No other prophet is so often quoted by Christ and his apostles. (See Matt. i. 22, iii. 3, viii. 17, xii. 18–20, xiii. 14; Luke iv. 17; Acts xxviii. 25; Rom. ix. 27, and x. 16; Phil. ii. 10.) In our translation of the New Testament he is always called Esaias. He has been pronounced by some critics not inferior to Homer in poetical genius; and all agree that his book is a master-piece of beauty and sublimity both in thought and style.

Among the commentators on Isaiah are Saint Jerome, Vitringa, Lowth, Calmet, Eichhorn, Döderlein, Gesenius, Gataker, Hitzig, Rosenmüller, and Henderson; and, in the United States, Dr. Alexander and Mr. Albert Barnes.

Isambert, e′zôN′bair′, (Emile,) a French physician and biographer, a son of François André, noticed below, was born at Auteuil in 1828. Died October 27, 1876.

Isambert, (François André,) a French jurist and Protestant, born at Aunay (Eure-et-Loire) in 1792. He distinguished himself about 1825 as the defender of the rights of the free people of colour in Martinique, and "performed in France," says Taillandier, "a service like that which Clarkson and Wilberforce rendered in England." In 1830 he was appointed a judge (conseiller) of the court of cassation. He was a Liberal member of the Chamber of Deputies from 1830 to 1848, and supported Cavaignac and the cause of order in the Assembly of 1848. He was secretary of the French Society for the Abolition of Slavery, of which he is said to have been the founder. Among his works are a "Manual for the Publicist and Statesman," (4 vols., 1826,) and a "History of Justinian," (1856.) He wrote many able articles for the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale." Died in 1857.

See Taillandier, article in the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Isarn, e′zärn′, (Samuel,) a French poet, born at Castres in 1637, wrote "The Speaking Pistole," ("La Pistole parlante," 1660,) which had great success. Died in 1673.

Isauricus. See Leo III.

Is-cā′nĭ-us or Is-cā′nus, (Joseph,) surnamed also Devo′nius, an English poet, born at Exeter, derived his name from Isca, the place of his education. He accompanied Richard I. on a crusade to Palestine, and wrote a Latin poem "On the Trojan War," and another entitled "Antiocheis." Died about 1224.

Isée. See Isæus.

Iselin, èz′lăN′, (Isaac,) a Swiss writer, born at Bâle in 1728. He was assistant secretary of state from 1756 to his death. He became the enlightened advocate of reform in morals, education, and legislation, on which he wrote articles for the journals. His chief work is entitled "On the History of Mankind," ("Ueber die Geschichte der Menschheit." 1764.) Died in 1782.

Isenburg, ee′zẹn-bo͝orG′, [Fr. Isembourg, e′zôN′-boor′,] one of the great German families of Protestant princes and counts. It included the branches of Isenburg-Birstein, Isenburg-Philippseich, Isenburg-Büdingen, and others.

Isendoorn, van, vän ee′zẹn-dōrn′, or Ysendoorn, (Gijsbert,) a Dutch philosopher, born in Gelderland in 1601, published "Effata Philosophica," (1633,) "Ethica Peripatetica," (1659,) and other works. Died in 1657.

Isfendiyâr, is-fĕn′dee-yȧr′, or Asfandiyâr, ȧs-fȧn′-dee-yȧr′, one of the most celebrated heroes in Persian history, lived between the fifth and sixth centuries B.C., and is said to have been the first convert to the religion of Zoroaster, in which he was followed by his father Gushtâsp (Darius Hystaspis) and the whole Persian empire. This change of religion led to the invasion of Persia by Arjâsp, King of Turân, in which Isfendiyâr, by his bravery and heroism, not only saved his father's kingdom, but conquered India, Arabia, and the West. He was killed in battle by the celebrated Rōōstum.

Is′ĭ-dore [Gr. Ἰσίδωρος; Lat. Isido′rus; Fr. Isidore, e′ze′dor′; It. Isidoro, e-se-do′ro] of Charax, a Persian, who is supposed to have lived in the first century of our era, wrote a work called "Parthian Itinerary," which contains a list of the eighteen provinces of Parthia and of the chief towns, with the distances of the towns from each other.

Isidore of Moscow, a Russian prelate, was chosen Primate of Russia in 1437. He favoured the reunion of the Greek and Latin Churches at the Council of Florence, (1437.) Died at Rome in 1463.

Isidore, Saint, an eminent Spanish scholar and bishop, born at Carthagena about 570 A.D., was a brother of Leander, Archbishop of Seville. He understood Greek, Hebrew, and Latin, and was very influential in the Spanish Church. About 600 he was appointed Bishop of Seville. The Council of Toledo, held in 650, denominated him "the glory of the Catholic Church, and the most learned man of his age." Among his most important works are, in Latin, "A Chronicle from the Origin of the World to 626 A.D.," and "Twenty Books of Etymologies," which, says Dr. Hoefer, "is one of the most precious monuments for the history of human knowledge." Died in 636 A.D.

Is-ĭ-dō'rus OF MILETUS, a Greek architect of the sixth century, who was employed by the emperor Justinian to build the magnificent church of Saint Sophia in Constantinople, which is now used as a mosque.

I'sis, [Gr. 'Ἶσις,] one of the chief deities of the ancient Egyptians, was called the wife of Osiris and mother of Horus. She was worshipped as the goddess of fecundity, and appears to have represented nature or the earth. The cow was sacred to Isis. She had many worshippers in Greece and Rome. There were famous temples of Isis at Memphis and Denderah. She has been identified with the Hindoo ISI, (which see.)

Isla, ès'lâ, (JOSÉ FRANCISCO,) a witty and popular Spanish author, born at Segovia in 1703. He became a Jesuit and an eminent preacher. He effected a reform in the vicious style and bad taste that prevailed among the Spanish priests, which he ridiculed in his famous satirical romance "The Life of the Popular Preacher Fray Gerundio de Campazas," (3 vols., 1758,) which is called the best picture of Spanish manners of the eighteenth century. This work was condemned by the Inquisition. He made a Spanish version of "Gil Blas," under this title: "Adventures of Gil Blas, stolen from Spain, adopted in France by Le Sage, and restored to his Native Country and Language," (6 vols., 1787.) The Jesuits having been expelled from Spain in 1767, he retired to Bologna, where he died in 1781.

Isleif, is'lĭf, an Icelandic historian, was ordained a priest in Rome about 1056, and returned home. He wrote "Annals of Iceland and of Norway." Died about 1080.

Ismaeel or Ismaïl, is-mā-eel', a Moslem priest, was Imâm of the Sheeites in the second century of the Hejrah. At his death a division occurred among the Sheeites in respect to the succession. Those who adhered to the son of Ismaeel were called Ismaeelites or Ismaeelians, and became a powerful sect in Egypt and Persia.

Ismaeel, Ismaïl, or Ismaïl Shah, is-mā-eel' shâh, founder of the dynasty of Sofees of Persia, was born in 1487, and assumed royal power about the age of fourteen. He acquired several provinces of Persia by conquest, and died in 1524, leaving the throne to his son, Aboo-Modhaffer. Ismaeel is venerated by the Persians, who call him King of the Sheeites, (a religious sect.)

See MALCOLM, "History of Persia;" VON HAMMER-PURGSTALL, "Geschichte des Osmanischen Reichs."

Ismaeel (Ismaïl) II., King of Persia, the son of Aboo-Modhaffer, began to reign in 1576, and made himself detested by his sanguinary temper. After executing many innocent persons, he died in 1577, and was succeeded by his brother, Mohammed Meerza, (Mîrza.)

See MALCOLM, "History of Persia."

Ismael, the French for ISHMAEL, which see.

Ismail Pasha, is-mā-eel' pâ'shâ, former Khedive of Egypt, was born in Cairo in 1830. His uncle Said, the viceroy, in 1862 made him commandant of the army, and in 1863 he succeeded as viceroy. His lavish expenditures not only greatly encumbered his private estates, but embarrassed all the people of Egypt. In 1867 he acquired from the Porte the title of Khedive. He carried on extensive wars of conquest in the Soudan. In 1869 the Suez Canal was opened. In 1879 the pressure of the foreign creditors became so great that the Sultan, urged by the representatives of the European powers, directed Ismail to abdicate. The abdication took effect June 26, 1879, and Ismail retired to Naples. His son TEWFIK succeeded as khedive.

Isnard, ès'nâR', (ACHILLE NICOLAS,) a French political economist and writer, born in Paris; died about 1803.

Isnard, (MAXIMIN,) a French Girondist, republican, and orator, born at Grasse, in Provence, in 1751, was chosen a member of the Legislative Assembly in 1791. He was one of the most able and enthusiastic partisans of the Revolution, to which he often gave a new impulse by his brilliant, impetuous, and inflammatory eloquence. He was one of the first members of the committee of public safety, the formation of which he first proposed and was president of the Convention a few days in May, 1793, during the struggle between his party and the Jacobins. He was involved in the fatal proscription of the Girondists, but escaped death by concealment. In 1795 he was chosen a member of the Council of Five Hundred. He retired from political life when Napoleon became consul, and published an essay on the "Immortality of the Soul," (1801,) in which he professes himself a convert to revealed religion. He maintained a fair reputation for honour and probity, and died about 1830. Lamartine, who calls him the Danton of the Gironde, says, "His speeches were magnificent odes, which exalted discussion into lyric enthusiasm." ("History of the Girondists.") "Isnard was the man of the Girondist party," says Charles Nodier, "who possessed in the highest degree the gift of those vehement inspirations which burst like thunder in sudden and terrible explosions."

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale;" THIERS, "History of the French Revolution."

Isnardi, ès-naR'dee, (GIAMBATTISTA,) an Italian savant, born near Nice in 1749, wrote a "Memoir on the Monuments of India and Egypt." Died in 1830.

Isocrate. See ISOCRATES.

I-soc'ra-tēs, [Gr. 'Ἰσοκράτης; Fr. ISOCRATE, e'zo'-kRât'; It. ISOCRATE, e-sok'rā-tà,] one of the ten great Athenian orators, born at Athens in 436 B.C., received lessons from Gorgias, Prodicus, and Theramenes, and was an intimate friend of Plato. He soon surpassed these masters in the rhetorical art; but his insuperable constitutional timidity defeated his political aspirations, and disqualified him for a public debater or an oracle of the "fierce democracy." He opened a school of eloquence, which numbered among its pupils many eminent men, such as Isæus, Timotheus, Xenophon, and Hyperides. Cicero compared his school to the wooden horse of Troy, from which issued the principal Grecian chiefs. He composed orations and forensic arguments for clients or others, and discourses on moral and political questions. His style is extremely polished and harmonious, but perhaps too artificial and diffuse. His character was honourable, his political principles were moderate and sincerely patriotic. He was one of the few who had the courage to appear in mourning for the death of Socrates. It is said that the disastrous battle of Chæronea affected him so deeply that he refused to eat afterwards, and died at the age of ninety-eight. Twenty-one of his orations are extant.

Iturbide, e-toor'be-dà, (Don AUGUSTIN,) Emperor of Mexico, born at Valladolid (Mexico) in 1784, (one account says 1790.) He fought against the insurgents in the war of independence which began in 1810, and rose to the rank of general. About the end of 1821 he became the master-spirit of a successful plot for the liberation of Mexico from the Spanish rule. He was proclaimed emperor in May, 1822; but his power was resisted by a large party in the Congress and by many generals, who preferred a republic. Finding his position untenable, he abdicated, and was banished in May, 1823. In July, 1824, he returned almost alone, and, just after he landed, was arrested and shot as a traitor.

I-u'lus, [Gr. Ἴουλος; Fr. IULE, e'ül',] a son of Æneas. (See ASCANIUS.)

Ivan or Iwan (e-vân') I., a Russian prince, who began to reign in Moscow at the death of his brother George, in 1328, and was tributary to the Tartars. His dominions consisted of Vladimir, Moscow, and Novogorod. His reign was peaceful, and lasted twenty-two years.

His grandson, Ivan II., son of Simeon, born in 1325, was recognized by the Tartars as heir to the throne in 1353. The events of his short reign were unimportant. In his last illness he took, according to usage, the monastic vows, and died in 1358.

See KARAMZIN, "Histoire de Russie."

Ivan III., (Vasilievitch,) son of Basil IV., ascended the Russian throne in 1462, and is sometimes styled IVAN I., CZAR OF MUSCOVY. He liberated his realm from the tribute which the Tartars had exacted by right of conquest from his predecessors, and is regarded as the founder of the empire. About 1475 he defeated, in several actions, the Tartar chief Ahmed, (or Akhmet,) and extended his dominions by the conquest of various princes. He embellished Moscow, the capital, with fine edifices, and patronized the industrial arts. In 1486 he assumed the title of "Sovereign of all the Russias." He died in 1505, aged sixty-six, and was succeeded by his son Basil.

See HEBERSTEIN, "Rerum Moscoviticarum Commentarii," 1549.

Ivan IV., or Ivan Vasilievitch II., surnamed THE TERRIBLE, grandson of the preceding, inherited the throne at the death of Basil, his father, in 1533, when he was four years of age. He assumed the titles of Czar and Autocrat about the age of fifteen. He conquered Kazan and Astrachan from the Tartars, and waged war against Sweden and Poland without decisive results. Siberia was discovered and partially subdued in his reign. About 1582 the first printing-press was established by him in Russia. He displayed energy and ability in promoting civilization, but is charged with excessive cruelty in the exercise of his unrestrained power. Died in 1584.

Jack, [Lat. JACHÆ'US,] (GILBERT,) a Scottish metaphysician, born at Aberdeen about 1578. He became professor of philosophy at Leyden in early life. He published several works, among which is "Institutiones Physicæ," (1612.) Died in 1628.

Jack, (THOMAS,) a Scottish minister of Eastwood, wrote "Onomasticon Poeticum," (1592.) Died in 1596.

Jack, (WILLIAM,) LL.D., a Scottish mathematician, born at Stewarton in 1834. He was educated at the Universities of Glasgow and Cambridge, was professor of natural philosophy in Owens College, Manchester, 1866–70, and in 1879 became professor of mathematics in the University of Glasgow.

Jack'son, (ANDREW,) a celebrated American general and statesman, born in the Waxhaw settlement, North or South Carolina, on the 15th of March, 1767. Parton states that he was born in Union county, North Carolina, but adds that "General Jackson always supposed himself to be a native of South Carolina," for in his proclamation to the nullifiers of South Carolina he thus addresses them: "Fellow-citizens of my native State." He was a son of Andrew Jackson, an Irishman, who emigrated to America in 1765 and died poor in 1767. The name of his mother was Elizabeth Hutchinson. We have little definite information about the schools that he attended. According to Parton, "he learned to read, to write, and cast accounts;—little more. . . . He was never a well-informed man." Having taken arms against the British in 1781, he was captured, and afterwards wounded by an officer because he refused to clean his boots. About 1785 he began to study law at Salisbury, North Carolina. He was addicted in his youth to gambling, horse-racing, and other sports. He was an excellent horseman, "a capital shot," was very dignified in manner, and was distinguished for his courage and activity. His stature was six feet and one inch high.

In 1788 he removed to Nashville, Tennessee, where he began to practise law. He speedily obtained a large practice, of which disputed land-claims formed the principal subject. About 1792 he married Rachel Robards, originally Rachel Donelson, whose first husband was living and had taken preliminary measures to obtain a divorce, which was legally completed in 1793. The marriage ceremony was again performed in 1794. Jackson, following a custom then extremely common in the South and West, fought a number of duels in the early part of his life. He was a member of the Convention which framed the Constitution of Tennessee in 1796, and in the autumn of that year was elected representative to Congress by the people of Tennessee, which was then entitled to only one member. He supported Thomas Jefferson in the Presidential election of 1796. In 1797 he became a Senator of the United States for Tennessee. He resigned his seat in the Senate in 1798, "partly because he felt himself out of place in so slow and dignified a body, but chiefly for pecuniary reasons." He was a judge of the supreme court of Tennessee from 1798 to 1804. In 1806 he challenged and killed Charles Dickinson in a duel with pistols, receiving himself a severe wound. This affair impaired for many years his popularity in Tennessee and other parts of the United States.

In 1807, while the trial of Aaron Burr was still undetermined, Jackson "harangued the crowd, [at Richmond,] defending Burr, and angrily denouncing Jefferson as a persecutor." (Parton's "Life.") After war had been declared against Great Britain, General Jackson (who several years before had been appointed major-general of militia) offered his services, and those of 2500 volunteers, in June, 1812. He was ordered to New Orleans, and led a body of 2070 men in that direction; but at Natchez he received an order dated February 6, 1813, by which his troops were dismissed from public service. In September, 1813, he had an affray with Colonel Thomas H. Benton at Nashville, and was severely wounded by his brother, Jesse Benton. In October next he took the field against the Creek Indians, whom he defeated at Talladega in November. By his services in this Creek war, which ended in 1814, he acquired great popularity, and in May, 1814, he was appointed a major-general in the regular army. He was soon after ordered to the Gulf of Mexico, to oppose an expected invasion of the British. In November he seized Pensacola, which belonged to Spain but was used by the British as a base of operations. About the 1st of December he moved his army to New Orleans, which was then ill prepared for defence. The British fleet, conveying an army of veterans who had fought under Wellington, entered Lake Borgne December 13, and captured several gunboats. General Jackson proclaimed martial law in the city on the 16th. On the 23d the enemy advanced to a point about nine miles below the city, and were attacked in the night by General Jackson, who had about 2100 men. The result of this action was favourable to the defenders of the city, who gained time to fortify their position. On the 25th of December Sir Edward Pakenham arrived and took command of the invaders, whose number was about 12,000. Jackson, who had a much smaller army, composed partly of the unerring marksmen of Tennessee and Kentucky, repulsed an attack on the 1st of January, 1815. On the 8th of January the British made a general assault on the American lines, but were defeated with great loss by the deadly fire of the riflemen and artillery. Generals Pakenham and Gibbs were killed. "Seven hundred killed," says Parton, "fourteen hundred wounded, and five hundred prisoners, were the dread result of that twenty-five minutes' work. Jackson's loss was eight killed and thirteen wounded." The victory of New Orleans, which was one of the most brilliant and decisive ever gained by an American army, raised Jackson's reputation as a general to the highest point, and made him the idol of a large portion of the American people. This was the last battle of the war, a treaty of peace having been signed in Europe in December, 1814.

In March, 1815, while that city was still under martial law, Judge Hall, of New Orleans, granted a writ of habeas corpus for the release of Mr. Louaillier, who had been arrested by order of Jackson, for exciting discontent among the troops. The latter, instead of obeying the writ, had the judge arrested and kept in custody. Peace having been formally proclaimed, Hall was set at liberty. General Jackson was then summoned to answer for contempt of court. He was found guilty, and sentenced to pay a fine of one thousand dollars. He immediately paid the fine; but it was afterwards refunded with the interest by an act of Congress passed in February, 1844.

In 1817–18 he waged a successful war against the Seminoles in Florida, seized Pensacola, and executed Arbuthnot and Ambrister, two British subjects, accused of inciting the savages to hostile acts against the Americans. He was appointed Governor of Florida in 1821. Before this date he had built, near Nashville, a mansion called the "Hermitage," in which he resided many years. In 1823 he was elected a Senator of the United States, and nominated as candidate for the Presidency by the legislature of Tennessee. His competitors were John Quincy Adams, Henry Clay, and William H. Crawford. Jackson received ninety-nine electoral votes, Adams eighty-four, Crawford forty-one, and Clay thirty-seven. As no candidate had a majority, the election devolved on the House of Representatives, voting by States, each State having one vote. Through the influence of Mr. Clay, John Quincy Adams was elected, by the vote of thirteen States. General Jackson, who received the vote of seven States, became the implacable enemy of Mr. Clay, whom he stigmatized as "this Judas of the West." He habitually attributed the conduct of his political opponents to mean or improper motives, and, accordingly, hated Crawford, Clay, Adams, and Calhoun.

In 1828 he was elected President, receiving one hundred and seventy-eight electoral votes, while Mr. Adams received eighty-three. Calhoun became Vice-President. Martin Van Buren was appointed secretary of state. Jackson was the first President who proscribed public servants for political opinions. He made more removals in one year than all the other Presidents in forty years before. At a banquet in April, 1830, the President gave this famous toast: "Our Federal Union: it must be preserved." In April, 1831, he reorganized his cabinet, appointing Edward Livingston secretary of state, Louis McLane secretary of the treasury, Lewis Cass secretary of war, Levi Woodbury secretary of the navy, and Roger B. Taney attorney-general.

Among the principal events of his first term was his veto of the bill which granted a new charter to the Bank of the United States, (July, 1832.) This subject became the chief issue between the partisans of Jackson and his opponents, who supported Henry Clay in the Presidential election of 1832. General Jackson was re-elected, receiving two hundred and nineteen electoral votes out of two hundred and eighty-eight, which was the whole number, and Martin Van Buren succeeded Calhoun in the Vice-Presidency. In November, 1832, a Convention in South Carolina adopted an ordinance of nullification, by which they ordained that the tariff-law of 1828 "is null and void." The President electrified the country by his memorable proclamation against the nullifiers, December 11, 1832, in which he announced his resolution to crush any disunion movement with the strong hand. He was censured by the Senate for removing the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, September, 1833.

He used his influence to procure the election of Martin Van Buren to the Presidency in 1836, and retired finally from public life March 4, 1837. He afterwards joined the Presbyterian Church. In his last illness Dr. Edgar asked "what he would have done with Calhoun and the other nullifiers if they had kept on." "Hung them, sir, as high as Haman," was his reply. He died, without issue, at the Hermitage, on the 8th of June, 1845.

Jack'son, (ARTHUR,) an English Puritan minister, born in Suffolk in 1593, preached at Saint Faith's, London, until 1662, when he was ejected. He wrote "Annotations on the Old Testament," (1643–58.) Died in 1666.

Jackson, (CHARLES,) LL.D., an American jurist, was born in Newburyport, Massachusetts, in 1775. He graduated at Harvard with the highest honours of his class in 1793, studied law with Theophilus Parsons, and obtained an extensive practice in his native town. In 1803 he removed to Boston, where he practised law for many years. In 1813 he was made judge of the supreme court of Massachusetts, the duties of which he discharged for ten years. He was placed at the head of the commissioners appointed by the State in 1832 to revise her legislative enactments. Died in Boston in 1855. He published a "Treatise on the Pleadings and Practice in Real Actions, with Precedents," etc., (1828.)

Jackson, (CHARLES THOMAS,) M.D., an American chemist and geologist, born at Plymouth, Massachusetts, in June, 1805. He took the degree of M.D. at Harvard in 1829, after which he continued his studies in Paris, and passed several years in visits to various countries of Europe. In conjunction with Francis Alger, he published a work called "Mineralogy and Geology of Nova Scotia," (1832.) He became a resident of Boston about 1833, was appointed State geologist of Maine in 1836, and produced a "Report on the Geology of the State of Maine," (1837.) His second and third Reports on the same subject appeared in 1838 and 1839. He was appointed geologist of the State of New Hampshire in 1840. He claimed to be the original discoverer of anæsthetics, and was involved in a long controversy on this subject. Died August 29, 1880.

Jackson, (CONRAD FEGER,) an American general, born in Pennsylvania. He served as colonel in the Union army at Gaines's Mill, June 27, 1862, commanded a brigade at the battle of Antietam, September 17, and was killed at Fredericksburg, December 13, 1862.

Jackson, (CYRIL,) DR., a noted English divine, born at Stamford in 1742. He was offered the primacy of Ireland and an English bishopric, both of which he declined. He was tutor to the Prince of Wales, (George IV.) Died in 1819.

Jackson, (HELEN HUNT,) an American poet and author of much merit, was born in Amherst, Massachusetts, in 1831. She was the daughter of Professor N. W. Fiske. Her first husband was Mr. Hunt, an officer of the United States engineers, who died in 1863. In 1875 she married a Mr. Jackson. Her works include "Verses by H. H.," (1871,) "Bits of Travel," (1872,) "Bits of Talk," "A Century of Dishonour," and several volumes of tales for children. Died August 12, 1885.

Jackson, (HENRY R.,) was born in Georgia in 1820. He served as a colonel in the Mexican war, and was minister to Austria from 1853 to 1858. He published in 1851 "Tallulah, and other Poems." He was a general in the Confederate service, 1861–65, and won distinction as a lawyer. He was appointed United States minister to Mexico in 1885.

Jackson, (JAMES,) a lawyer, born in Devonshire, England, in 1757, emigrated to America in 1772. He fought with distinction against the British in Georgia in 1776–82, was elected to Congress in 1789, and was a United States Senator for Georgia from 1792 to 1795. In 1798 he became Governor of Georgia, and in 1801 was again elected a Senator of the United States. Died in Washington, March 19, 1806.

Jackson, (JAMES S.,) an American lawyer and general, born in Kentucky about 1822. He was elected a member of Congress in 1860 by the voters of the second district of Kentucky, but he resigned his seat and joined the Union army in 1861. He was killed at the battle of Perryville, October 8, 1862.

Jackson, (JOHN,) a clergyman of the Anglican Church, born in Yorkshire, England, in 1686. He was a zealous advocate of the Arian doctrines, which prevented his advancement in the church. Died in 1763. He wrote a valuable work entitled "Chronological Antiquities," (3 vols., 1752,) and numerous controversial treatises.

See DR. SUTTON, "Memoirs of the Life and Writings of John Jackson," 1764.

Jackson, (JOHN,) an able English engraver on wood, flourished about 1725–45.

Jackson, (JOHN,) an eminent English portrait-painter, born at Lastingham, Yorkshire, in 1778, became a resident of London about 1797, and was elected a member of the Royal Academy in 1817. Among his best works are portraits of Canova and Flaxman. Died in 1831.

See CUNNINGHAM, "Lives of British Painters."

Jackson, (JOHN ADAMS,) an American sculptor, born at Bath, Maine, November 5, 1825. He learned the trade of a machinist. He afterwards studied portrait-painting and crayon-work with success under D. C. Johnson, in Boston, and then practised sculpture in France and Italy. His portrait-busts and medallions are often excellent. Among his other works are "Eve lifting the Dead Abel," (1862,) "Peasant-Boy and Goat," "Culprit Fay," "Reading-Girl," the soldiers' monument at Lynn, Massachusetts, and "Hylas," (1879.) Died at Pracchia, in Tuscany, August 30, 1879.

He was elected in 1835 to the chair of the institutes of medicine in the University of Pennsylvania, which he filled with great credit to himself and the institution for twenty-eight years. He resigned in 1863. He wrote, besides other works, "Principles of Medicine," (1832,) and an "Introduction to Lehman's Chemical Physiology," (1856.) Died April 5, 1872.

Jackson, (THOMAS,) a learned English divine, born in Durham in 1579. He was the author of a "Commentary on the Apostles' Creed," and of several devotional treatises. He became Dean of Peterborough in 1638. His works are highly praised by Southey. Died in 1640.

See E. VAUGHAN, "Life of Thomas Jackson," 1673.

Jackson, (THOMAS,) an eminent English Methodist preacher, born at Sancton, Yorkshire, December 12, 1783. He was the author of a large number of religious and biographical works. Died at Richmond, March 11, 1873.

Jackson, (THOMAS JONATHAN,) commonly known by the name of STONEWALL JACKSON, a distinguished American general, born in Lewis county, Virginia, January 21, 1824, graduated at West Point in 1846, standing seventeenth in a class of fifty-nine. He was considered at West Point to be rather a dull and slow student. In the Mexican war (1846–47) he served as first lieutenant with distinction. Having resigned his commission in 1852, he became a professor in the Military Institute at Lexington, Virginia. About 1853 he married Miss Junkin, a daughter of Dr. Junkin, of Lexington. He was appointed a colonel of the Virginian troops in April, 1861, and commanded the force that was attacked by the Union army at Martinsburg, July 2. He served as brigadier-general at the battle of Bull Run, July 21, 1861, and was promoted to the rank of major-general in the following September. It has been currently stated that he received his surname from the fact that he and his men "stood like a stone wall" at the battle of Bull Run; but, according to one of his biographers, the name "Stonewall" was first applied to his brigade because it was recruited in a stone-wall country,—the counties of Jefferson, Page, Frederick, etc. He was defeated by General Shields near Winchester, March 23, 1862, and retreated up the valley to Harrisonburg, pursued by General Banks. Having been reinforced, he resumed the offensive with about twenty thousand men, attacked General Banks near Strasburg, May 23, and drove him back to the Potomac. On the approach of General Fremont from the west, General Jackson moved hastily up the valley to Harrisonburg. His army was overtaken by General Fremont at Cross Keys, where an indecisive battle was fought on the 8th of June. Before the end of June he moved his army to Richmond and joined that of General Lee. He commanded a corps at the battle of Gaines's Mill, June 27, and at that of Malvern Hill, July 1, 1862. On the 9th of August he defeated a small army under General Banks at Cedar Mountain, Virginia. He captured Harper's Ferry, with eleven thousand Union prisoners, on the 15th of September, and joined General Lee in time to take part in the battle of Antietam, September 17. He contributed to the victory at Fredericksburg, December 13, 1862, for which service he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-general. He remained inactive for several months, (January–April, 1863,) employed partly in preparing official reports. On the 1st of May he was ordered by General Lee to execute a flank movement on the right wing of General Hooker's army. He surprised and routed the eleventh corps, near Chancellorsville, on the evening of the 2d of May. As he was riding with his staff from the front towards the rear during that battle, he received a volley from his own men, who in the darkness mistook the staff for a party of Federal cavalry. General Jackson received three wounds, of which he died at Guinea's Station on the 10th of May, 1863. "His loss," says Mr. Greeley, "was the greatest yet sustained by either party in the fall of a single man; though Sidney Johnston had probably military talents of a higher order. But Jackson's power over his men was unequalled; and it was justified by the soundness of his judgment, as well as the intrepidity of his character. Contrary to the vulgar notion, his attacks were all well considered, and based on a careful calculation of forces; and he showed as high qualities in refusing to squander his men at Antietam, and again at Fredericksburg, as he did in his most brilliant charges. . . . It is doubtful if all the advantages, including prestige, which the rebels gained around Chancellorsville, were not dearly purchased by the loss of Thomas J. Jackson." ("American Conflict," vol. ii. pp. 359–60.) Stonewall Jackson was a man of deep and earnest religious convictions; and in his general character, as well as in his serene, indomitable courage and the extraordinary influence which he exerted over the minds of his soldiers, he reminds us of the great Puritan leaders who fought under Cromwell.

See DABNEY, "Life of General T. J. Jackson," and a "Life of General T. J. Jackson," in "Southern Generals," 1865.

Jackson, (THOMAS K.,) born in South Carolina about 1829, was made a brigadier-general in the Confederate army in 1861.

Jạ-co'bi, [Ger. pron. yâ-ko'bee,] (ABRAHAM,) M.D., a distinguished physician, born, of a Hebrew family, at Hartum, in Westphalia, May 6, 1830. He studied at Greifswalde and Göttingen, and graduated at Bonn in 1851. In 1853 he removed to New York, where he gave attention chiefly to gynæcology and diseases of children, and held several professorships. His principal works are "Dentition and its Derangements" (1862) and a "Treatise on Diphtheria," (1880.)

Jacobi, yâ-ko'bee, (HEINRICH FRIEDRICH,) an eminent German writer and thinker, born at Dusseldorf in 1743. His father was a merchant, and young Jacobi was destined to the same calling, although his tastes led him to other pursuits. At the age of sixteen he was sent to school at Frankfort. He afterwards went to Geneva, where he remained three years, applying himself to literary studies. During this period he acquired such a mastery of the French language as has rarely been equalled by any of his countrymen. On returning to Dusseldorf, he conducted his father's business for several years, without, however, abandoning his favourite pursuits. Afterwards, through the influence of his friend and patron the Count of Goltstein, he received an appointment under the government, and was thus enabled to devote his principal attention to philosophy and literature. About this time he married Betty von Clermont, of Aix-la-Chapelle, a lady of considerable wealth as well as of great accomplishments and personal attractions. In 1779 Jacobi was invited to Munich, where he became privy councillor. But, having exposed the abuses of the Bavarian system of customs, he fell into disfavour with the government, and withdrew to his estate near Dusseldorf. In 1804 he was again called to Munich, to aid in the establishment of the new Academy of Sciences in that city, of which institution he became president in 1807. He resigned this position in 1813, and died in 1819.

Among the works of Jacobi may be named "Edward Allwill's Correspondence," ("Eduard Allwill's Briefsammlung," 1781,) "On the Doctrine of Spinoza," ("Ueber die Lehre des Spinoza," 1785,) in a series of letters to Mendelssohn, "David Hume on Faith, or Idealism and Realism," ("David Hume über den Glauben, oder Idealismus und Realismus," 1787,) "Woldemar," (2 vols., 1799,) and "Of Divine Things and their Revelation," ("Von göttlichen Dingen und ihrer Offenbarung," 1811.)

"As a writer of fiction," observes Mrs. Austin, "Jacobi is distinguished for vigorous painting, admirable delineation of nature and the human heart, warmth and depth of feeling, and a lively, bold, yet correct turn of expression. As a philosopher, he is admired for his rare depth of thought, for the fervour of his religious feelings, and for the originality and beauty of his style." Again she says, "His character is rich in all that can attract the wise and good." "Jacobi is ranked, and justly," says Dr. Hedge, "among the philosophers of modern Germany, although his philosophy, far from shaping itself into a system, denies,—and that denial may be regarded as one of its leading characteristics,—on philosophical grounds, the possibility of a system, and maintains that any system of philosophy, carried to its legitimate results, must lead to fanaticism. He vindicated the 'affective' part of man's nature, which the Kantian exaltation of pure reason had seemed to disparage, at least to neglect, and gave to feeling its due place and authority as a medium and interpreter of truth. . . . He differed from contemporary philosophers in being a devout believer in revelation,—in the Christian revelation. The gospel was to him the test and criterion of all truth. For the rest, he was an eclectic, and welcomed light from whatever quarter it came. In philosophical insight he is surpassed by none; and, though his fixed idea of the impossibility of a systematic philosophy may have somewhat vitiated his view of existing philosophies, his criticisms on some of them are among the best that have been essayed."

Jacquard, zhä'kär', (JOSEPH MARIE,) a Frenchman, celebrated for his inventions in the art of weaving, was born in Lyons, July 7, 1752. At an early age, being employed as a type-founder, and afterwards as a cutler, he exhibited an uncommon mechanical genius. In 1793 he assisted in the defence of his native city against the army of the Convention. He subsequently served for a short period in the army of the Rhine. In 1801 he completed his great invention for weaving the finest and richest kinds of figured cloth. This apparatus, which bears his name,—the Jacquard loom,—though at first strongly opposed by the weavers of France, has been brought into general use both in Europe and in America, and, instead of destroying the occupation of labourers, it has greatly increased the number of operatives employed in the manufacture of figured stuffs. Jacquard also invented a machine for weaving nets. For this invention he received a gold medal in 1804 from the inspectors of Paris. While in that city, he was introduced to Napoleon I. Died in 1834. In 1840 a public statue was raised to his memory by the citizens of Lyons.

Jamblichus or Jamblicus, a Platonic philosopher, and native of Syria. He flourished under the reign of the emperor Julian, who dedicated numerous epistles to him.

Jam'blĭ-chus or I-am'blĭ-chus Chal-ci-de'nus, [Gr. Ἰάμβλιχος; Fr. JAMBLIQUE, zhôN'blēk',] an eminent heathen philosopher, born at Chalcis, in Syria, flourished in the reign of Constantine the Great, (306–37 A.D.) He was a pupil of Porphyry, and was attached to the Neo-Platonic school. Many of the Neo-Platonists encouraged a life of ascetic meditation and a belief in magic and divination. Their system was built on the doctrine of emanation,—that the souls of all beings, after the requisite purification, return to the Source from which they emanated. Jamblichus wrote a "Life of Pythagoras," a treatise on the "Mysteries of the Egyptians," and several other works. To his influence is ascribed the prevalence of magic, sacrifices, and superstition in the Neo-Platonic philosophy.

Jâmee, Jâmî, or Djami, jä'mee, (Moolla-Noor ed-Deen-(Nour-ed-Din-) Abd-er-Rahman, mōōl'lä nōōr-ed-deen' ăbd ĕr-räh'măn,) written also Djamy and Dschami, a celebrated Persian poet, born at Jâm, (or Djam,) in Khorassân, in 1414, lived at Herât, where he enjoyed the bounty of the Sultan Aboo-Saeed, (Abou-Said.) Among his principal works are "The Chain of Gold," (Sil'silet-zah'ab or -zeh'eb,) a collection of satires, and "The Loves of Joseph and Zuleika, and Mejnoon and Leila." He also wrote "Behâristân," ("Abode of Spring,") a treatise on morality, in prose and verse, which is admired for its graceful style as well as for its sentiments. Jâmee has sometimes been called "the Persian Petrarch." He was devoted to the doctrine of the Soofees; and many of his poems are characterized by the spiritual or mystical ideas of that sect. Died in 1492.

James [Sp. JAIME, hī'mā] I., King of Aragon, surnamed THE CONQUEROR, succeeded to the throne in 1213. He quelled an insurrection formed against him by his nobles, and checked the encroachments of papal power. Died in 1276. He was succeeded by his son, Pedro III.

See T. DE SOTO, "Vida del Rey Don Jaime I. de Aragon," 1622.

James II., King of Aragon, surnamed THE JUST, son of Peter III., was born in 1261. He ascended the throne in 1291. He annexed Catalonia and Valencia to his territory, and carried on long wars against Navarre and the Moors. He was a brave, magnanimous, and benevolent prince. Died in 1327.

James I. of England and VI. of Scotland was born in the Castle of Edinburgh in June, 1566. He was the only child of Mary Queen of Scots and her husband Henry Lord Darnley, (called, after his marriage, King Henry.) Both Queen Mary and Lord Darnley were grandchildren of Margaret Tudor, sister of Henry VIII. of England. It was through this princess that James claimed the throne of England. In 1567 Lord Darnley was murdered, James was placed under the care of the Earl of Mar, and Queen Mary married Bothwell, and was soon after made prisoner by the insurgent lords. Mary was forced to abdicate in favour of her son, who was crowned, as James VI., on the 29th of July, 1567. During his minority Scotland was fearfully rent by contending factions and the violent disputes of the Protestants and Catholics. The regent Morton having rendered himself odious by his tyrannical acts, a successful conspiracy was formed against him by a majority of the Scottish nobles. Morton, however, on account of his Protestant proclivities, soon regained his former influence. James from the commencement of his reign exhibited a weak and frivolous passion for favourites. His cousin Esme Stuart, Lord D'Aubigny, a native of France, obtained the principal ascendency over his youthful mind. Captain James Stuart held the second place in the king's esteem. Lord D'Aubigny was created Duke of Lennox, and Captain Stuart Earl of Arran. Both eagerly plotted the destruction of Morton, who was put to death in 1581. In 1582 a company of nobles seized King James, confined him in the castle of Ruthven, in Perthshire, imprisoned Arran, and forced Lennox to retire to France. This revolt is known in history as the Raid of Ruthven. At the expiration of ten months, James recovered his liberty and reinstated Arran in his former power. In 1585 a treaty was concluded between the English and Scottish sovereigns. Elizabeth conferred upon James an annual pension of five thousand pounds, and through her influence deprived the Earl of Arran of all emoluments. In 1586 James formed another treaty with England, offensive and defensive, for the protection of the Protestant religion. In 1587 Mary Queen of Scots was executed. James at first appeared insulted and enraged; he threatened to invade the dominions of Elizabeth; but, feeling more interested for the inheritance of the crown of England than for his honour or for filial duty, he was soon pacified. In 1589 he married Anne, daughter of the King of Denmark. In 1594 he quelled a rebellion of the Catholic lords. Bothwell also, having taken part in this revolt, was obliged to fly from the country, to which he never returned. James was an earnest advocate of Episcopacy, and made strenuous efforts to establish it in his dominions, in opposition to the wishes of the people. On this account a tumult was raised in Edinburgh in 1596, from which his life appeared to be in imminent danger. But James, exhibiting for him an unusual share of spirit and energy, dexterously turned this to his own advantage. In 1600 he was decoyed to the castle of the Earl of Gowrie, where Ruthven, brother of the earl, made an attempt on the king's life, on which occasion both the noblemen were slain. The Gowrie Conspiracy has always been veiled in mystery,—no historian having yet unravelled it.

On the death of Elizabeth, in 1603, James became King of England. He displeased his new subjects by the prodigality of his gifts to his Scottish favourites. He continued the foreign policy of Elizabeth by concluding a treaty with Henry IV. of France for assisting Holland against Spain. In 1605, chiefly through King James's penetration, the Gunpowder Plot was discovered. (See FAWKES, GUY.) The year 1612 was marked by the death of Henry, Prince of Wales, who by his manly and noble qualities had been far more successful than his father in winning the affections of the English people. In 1613, James's daughter, the princess Elizabeth, was married to Frederick, the Elector-Palatine. Among the king's favourites were successively Sir George Hume, Philip Herbert, Earl of Montgomery, and Robert Carr or Ker, a young Scotchman who by his handsome person monopolized the royal favour. He was created Earl of Somerset. In 1615 Carr was tried and convicted on a charge of poisoning his friend Sir Thomas Overbury. This made room for a new favourite, named Villiers, who was created Duke of Buckingham, and who retained his influence over the king during the remainder of the reign. In 1617 James visited Scotland, where he was very zealous in introducing episcopal forms into the Established Church. In 1618 Sir Walter Raleigh was executed on the pretended charge of conspiracy, but in fact to conciliate the court of Spain. The public contempt which this excited against James was increased by his behaviour towards the Elector-Palatine, whom the Bohemians had chosen as their king, and who was attacked by the united forces of Austria and Spain. James pusillanimously refused to give his son-in-law any assistance or encouragement. Frederick had been the Protestant champion of Europe, and the people of Britain hesitated not to express their grief and rage. During a long period James had wished to form a Spanish alliance for Prince Charles; and he now hastened the negotiations. This alliance was, however, broken off through the rashness and insolence of Buckingham. Finally, in 1624, war was declared against Spain, and an army was fitted out to assist the Elector. Owing to pestilence and mismanagement, this army never entered the Palatinate, which remained in the possession of the Duke of Bavaria. James died in March, 1625, after a reign of nearly fifty-eight years, during twenty-two of which he sat on the throne of England. He had seven children by his queen, Anne of Denmark, of whom only Prince Charles and the Princess Elizabeth survived him.

"No prince," says Hume, "so little enterprising and so inoffensive, was ever so much exposed to the opposite extremes of calumny and flattery, of satire and panegyric. . . . Many virtues, it must be owned, he was possessed of; but scarce any of them pure or free from the contagion of the neighbouring vices. His generosity bordered on profusion, his learning on pedantry, his pacific disposition on pusillanimity, his wisdom on cunning, his friendship on light fancy and boyish fondness." (Hume's "History of England," chapter xlix. Respecting the character of James, see, also, Gardiner's "History," referred to below, vol. i. chap. ii. pp. 55–57.) James was the author of numerous works, which displayed considerable learning and no little pedantry; but the most important of his labours was the supervision of the present translation of the Bible, which will remain as a lasting monument of his industry and munificence. The translation was not only made under his immediate superintendence, but the excellent rules by which the translators were governed were drawn up by James himself. Among his works we may cite "Basilicon Doron, or his Majesties Instructions to his Dearest Son, Henry the Prince," "The Essays of a Prentice in the Divine Art of Poesy," "The True Law of Free Monarchies," "Dæmonology," and "A Counterblast to Tobacco."

James II. of England and VII. of Scotland, son of Charles I., and younger brother of Charles II., was born at Saint James's, London, in 1633, and soon after was created Duke of York. He was taken prisoner by the Parliamentarians in 1646. In 1648 he escaped to Holland, and went to Paris, where he remained nearly four years. Having received a commission in the French army, he served under Marshal Turenne until the peace concluded between Cromwell and the French obliged him to leave the kingdom. At the restoration, in 1660, James accompanied his brother to England, where he received the appointments of lord high admiral and lord warden of the Cinque Ports. The same year he married Anne, daughter of Chancellor Hyde. In 1664 the Duke of York was an earnest advocate of the war with Holland. He took command of the fleet, and in June, 1665, gained an important victory over the Dutch. In 1671 the Duchess of York died, and James avowed himself a Roman Catholic. In 1672 war was renewed against Holland, and James, as lord admiral, assumed the command of the navy. In 1673 the Test Act was passed against Catholics and dissenters. By it the Duke of York was compelled to resign the command of the navy, and all other offices which he held under government. The same year he married Maria Beatrice Eleonora, daughter of the Duke of Módena. In 1677, greatly to the satisfaction of the English nation, Mary, daughter of the Duke of York, was married to her cousin William, Prince of Orange, who was a Protestant.

In 1679, during the commotions of the Oates Popish Plot, James retired to the continent. In his absence a bill for excluding him from the throne was brought before the Parliament. It was passed by the Commons, but was rejected by the Lords. Upon the death of King Charles, in 1685, James ascended the throne unopposed, and promised to maintain and defend the Established Church. He summoned a Parliament, which voted him all the revenues his brother had enjoyed. Having declared his intention of continuing the alliance formed by Charles with France, he received from Louis XIV. 500,000 livres. Strong suspicions were soon excited against the king by his arbitrary measures. It became too manifest that he only intended to keep his promises until he could break them with safety. He sent an agent to Rome to promote the restoration of Roman Catholicism in England; he publicly attended the illegal celebration of the mass, and laboured earnestly for the repeal of the Test Act. The blindness of his zeal was so apparent that even the pope advised him to exercise more caution. In June, 1685, England was invaded by the Duke of Monmouth, a natural son of Charles II. Monmouth was totally defeated at Sedgemoor on the 5th of July, was captured two days after, and executed. James now exhibited his true character. Colonel Kirke and the infamous Judge Jeffreys were sent to the western counties, which had been the principal scene of Monmouth's insurrection, and, by the king's express authority, perpetrated a series of butcheries. Men were shot and hung without the form of trial, and women were burned at the stake for sheltering fugitives. In opposition to law, he admitted Catholics to the highest rank in the army and the navy. Protestants holding high offices of state were discharged, and a court resembling that of the high commission under Charles I. was established. Episcopal dioceses were given to professed Catholics, and the Protestant clergy were driven from the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge to make room for foreign priests. In June, 1688, the queen gave birth to a son, who was suspected to be spurious. Previous to this period, Mary, Princess of Orange, had been regarded as the heir-apparent to the crown, and the English people had hoped that at length they would again be governed by a Protestant sovereign. These hopes being now blighted, they applied to the Prince of Orange for assistance in an effort to depose the king. He was prepared to accept the invitation which they sent him; and in November, 1688, he landed in Devonshire, with about fourteen thousand men. The king, deserted by the nobility, the gentry, the army, his friends, and his servants, quitted the island in December, and fled to France, where he was kindly received by Louis XIV. Soon after, the Prince and Princess of Orange were crowned, as King William III. and Queen Mary. In 1689 James landed in Ireland with a small force given him by Louis. He besieged Londonderry, which he was unable to take. On the 1st of July, 1690, King William, who commanded in person, totally defeated James's army at the battle of the Boyne, and firmly established his own power. James soon returned to France, and resided at Saint Germain's until his death, which occurred in September, 1701. As a king, he was brave, determined, energetic. He did much for the improvement of the British navy; he was industrious, and frugal of the public money. But he was implacable in revenge, and his blind bigotry cost him three kingdoms. James had by his first wife, Anne Hyde, eight children, of whom only Queen Mary and the Princess Anne survived him. By his second wife, Mary of Módena, he had six children, two of whom outlived him. He also had four children by Arabella Churchill, a sister of the Duke of Marlborough, and one by Catherine Sedley.

James I., King of Scotland, of the house of Stuart, and son of Robert III., was born about 1394. In 1405 his father sent him to France, in order that he might escape the intrigues of the Duke of Albany; but he was seized by a British fleet, carried as prisoner to London, and thrown into the Tower, whence, after remaining there more than two years, he was taken to Windsor. In 1417, when King Henry V. invaded France, James was obliged to accompany him. In 1424, after a captivity of nineteen years, he was released and restored to his kingdom. While the young king was in England, Henry V. had given him a good education; and, upon his accession to power, James commenced with energy and firmness to reform the laws and customs of Scotland. During his captivity Scotland had been governed successively by the two Dukes of Albany as regents, who had increased their own power and that of the feudal lords, to the detriment of the royal authority. On the recovery of his kingdom he resolved to check with a strong hand the arrogance and lawlessness of the nobles. He seized his cousin Murdo, Duke of Albany, his sons, the Earls of Douglas, Lennox, Angus, and many other peers and barons. All were reconciled to the king except the Duke of Albany, his sons, and the Earl of Lennox, who were tried and executed. This blow struck terror into the order of nobles. The king continued to conduct his reforms with ability and prudence. One part of his policy was to raise the ecclesiastical power in order to balance that of the barons. James had married Joanna Beaufort, a lady of the blood-royal of England. Although the earls at first received the innovations of the king in a spirit of submission, they at length, perceiving the rapid decline of their authority, formed a conspiracy against him, and assassinated him in 1437. James had the reputation of being one of the most accomplished princes of his day. He produced several poetical pieces and songs, which were greatly admired, and in which much literary taste was displayed. There yet remains his "Kings Quhair." Robertson justly remarks that "it was the misfortune of James that his maxims and manners were too refined for the age in which he lived. Happy had he reigned in a kingdom more civilized. His love of peace, of justice, and of elegance would have rendered his schemes successful; and, instead of perishing because he attempted too much, a grateful people would have applauded and seconded his efforts to reform and improve them."

See BUCHANAN, "Rerum Scoticarum Historia;" BURTON, "History of Scotland," vol. iii. chap. xxvii.; ROBERTSON, "History of Scotland."

James II., son and successor of the preceding, was born in 1430. He had for his adviser an able man, named Crichton, who during his minority obtained chief control of the government. Crichton impressed on the mind of the young monarch the necessity of further humbling the nobility. But what James I. had attempted to do slowly and by legal means, his son and Crichton pursued with an impetuosity as unscrupulous as it was unwise. William, sixth Earl of Douglas, having defied the royal authority, was decoyed by Crichton to an interview in the Castle of Edinburgh, where both he and his brother were murdered. James stabbed with his own hand William, eighth Earl of Douglas. This led to a revolt, and the house of Stuart appeared to be in imminent peril. The Earl of Douglas commanded the greater number and more warlike followers; but, owing to his want of energy, nearly all his retainers deserted him before a battle was fought, and he was obliged to fly to England. James would in all probability have succeeded in his plans, had he not been killed in 1460 by the bursting of a cannon.

See BURTON, "History of Scotland," vol. iii. chap. xxviii.; ROBERTSON, "History of Scotland."

James III., the son and successor of James II., was born in 1453. During his minority the kingdom was governed successively by Bishop Kennedy and Lord Boyd. James married Margaret of Denmark about 1470. He had respectable abilities, and was a lover of the fine arts and literature. The nobles were offended because he neglected them and chose for his associates artists, musicians, and other persons of inferior rank. The king's brothers, the Duke of Albany, and the Earl of Mar, conspired with the malcontent nobles against James, who was defeated by them in battle near Bannockburn in 1488, and was murdered as he fled from the field.

See BURTON, "History of Scotland;" ROBERTSON, 'History of Scotland."

James IV., King of Scotland, succeeded his father, James III., in 1488, at the age of fifteen. He was generous and brave, loved magnificence, delighted in war, and was eager to obtain fame. During his reign the ancient and hereditary enmity between the king and the nobles appears almost entirely to have ceased. During the revolt which had cost James III. his life, his son had been compelled or persuaded to set himself at the head of it, and was openly declared king. He was subsequently troubled by remorse for this deed, and, not being free from superstition, he received from the pope, as penance, an iron belt to be worn without cessation for the remainder of his life. He also performed several pilgrimages on foot. James founded (1497) the University of Aberdeen, and he also created the order of Knights of the Thistle, (or of Saint Andrew.) In 1513, in opposition to the advice of his sagest counsellors, he rashly invaded England with one of the most loyal and gallant armies that ever a Scottish king had commanded, and was defeated at the famous battle of Flodden, where the flower of the Scottish chivalry perished. The king, with twelve earls, thirteen lords, and a great number of barons, died upon the field, in September, 1513.

See BURTON, "History of Scotland," vol. iii. chap. xxx.; ROBERTSON, "History of Scotland."

James V., a son of James IV., was born in 1512, and succeeded his father in 1513. The regency was conferred upon his cousin, the Duke of Albany, a man of enterprise and ability, who was desirous to extend the royal authority; but, in spite of all his exertions, the aristocracy retained their power, and the duke resigned his authority about 1525. The king was then in his thirteenth year, and the nobles agreed that he should assume the government. The Earl of Angus, however, by his intrigues, obtained the chief control of affairs, and kept the young king as a prisoner in his own palace. James, after suffering this for some time, escaped, and Angus was obliged to fly from the country. Firmly seated upon the throne, James continued the policy of his predecessors in humbling the nobility. Commencing very cautiously, he found loyal supporters among the clergy, the principal of whom was Cardinal Beaton. The nobles had received too severe a blow at Flodden to resist, and James pushed forward his plans in an unscrupulous and arbitrary manner. He married Mary of Guise in 1538. Henry VIII. of England declared war against him in 1542, and he was obliged to seek the assistance of those nobles whom he had oppressed. They took up arms at his command, were led by him against the English, and were at first successful; but, owing to the lateness of the season, and to other causes of discontent, they refused to follow up their good fortune. A second expedition across the border was still less successful: nearly ten thousand Scots were taken prisoners, or, as some say, went deliberately over to the English. This proved too great a blow to the proud and ambitious monarch, who died of a broken heart in December, 1542, in the thirty-first year of his age, leaving the crown to his only legitimate child, the unfortunate Mary Queen of Scots. He had several natural children, one of whom was the famous Regent Murray.

James VI. OF SCOTLAND. See JAMES I. OF ENGLAND.

James, [Gr. Ἰάκωβος; Lat. JACO'BUS; Ger. JAKOB, yä'kob; Fr. JACQUES, zhăk; Sp. SANTIAGO, sän-te-ä'go; It. GIACOMO, jä'ko-mo,] one of the twelve apostles, commonly called SAINT JAMES, son of Zebedee, and brother of Saint John. He was one of the three apostles who appeared to be the most intimately associated with our Saviour. He suffered martyrdom about 44 A.D., by the order of Herod Agrippa.

See Matthew iv. 21, x. 2, xvii.; Luke viii. 51.

James, called THE LESS, was one of the twelve apostles, and is generally supposed to have been the brother of our Saviour, and the author of the Epistle bearing that name. Josephus states that he was put to death by the high-priest Ananias about 62 or 63 A.D.

See Matthew x. 3, xiii. 55, xxvii. 56; Mark iii. 18, vi. 3, xv. 40; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13.

James, (CHARLES T.,) an American Senator and inventor, born in West Greenwich, Rhode Island, about 1805. In 1851 he was elected a Senator of the United States for six years by the legislature of Rhode Island. He invented a rifled cannon, and was killed at Sag Harbour, Long Island, in October, 1862, by the explosion of a shell on which he was experimenting.

James, zhăm, (CONSTANTIN,) a French medical writer, born at Bayeux in 1813. He edited Magendie's "Lectures on Physiology," etc., (1837–39.)

James, (GEORGE PAYNE RAINSFORD,) a very voluminous novelist and historian, born in London in 1801. Before attaining the age of seventeen he had written a series of Eastern tales, entitled "The String of Pearls." In 1825 he published "Richelieu," which had previously received the commendation of Sir Walter Scott and Washington Irving. This is thought to be his best production. In 1852 Mr. James was chosen British consul at Norfolk, in Virginia, and in 1858 received the same appointment for Venice. His works amount to one hundred and eighty-nine volumes. Of these we may mention "Philip Augustus," (1831,) "Adra, or the Peruvians, a Poem," "Memoirs of Great Commanders," (3 vols., 1832,) "History of Charlemagne," (1832,) "Lives of Foreign Statesmen," (5 vols., 1832–38,) and "Cameralzaman," a dramatic poem, (1848.) Died in 1860.

See "New Spirit of the Age," by R. H. HORNE, London, 1844; ALLIBONE, "Dictionary of Authors;" "North American Review" for April, 1844, (by E. P. WHIPPLE.)

James, (Sir HENRY,) an English general, born near Saint Agnes, Cornwall, in 1803. He was educated at Woolwich, and in 1825 entered the royal engineers. He invented photozincography, and executed valuable facsimile plates by that process. He published accounts of the ordnance surveys of the three kingdoms, besides other works of permanent value. Died June 14, 1877.

James, (HENRY,) an able and original writer on theology, born at Albany in 1811. About 1843 he became acquainted with the writings of Swedenborg, whose leading doctrines he appears to have fully embraced, without, however, joining himself to the ecclesiastical organization of Swedenborgians. He published, besides other works, "Moralism and Christianity," (1852,) "Christianity the Logic of Creation," (1857,) "Substance and Shadow, etc.," (1863,) and "The Secret of Swedenborg, being an Elucidation of his Doctrine of the Divine Natural Humanity," (1869.) Died December 18, 1882.

James, (Sir HENRY,) an English lawyer, born at Hereford, October 30, 1828. He studied at Cheltenham College and at the Middle Temple, was called to the bar in 1852, was made a Queen's counsel in 1869, and a bencher in 1870. He entered Parliament in 1869, became solicitor-general in 1873, and attorney-general in the same year.

James, (HENRY,) an American novelist and critic, a son of Henry James, (1811–1882,) was born in New York city, April 15, 1843. He was educated in Paris, Geneva, and Bonn, and early became known as a contributor to American journals. His principal works are "Roderick Hudson," (1875,) "The American," (1876,) "The Europeans," (1879,) "The Portrait of a Lady," (1881,) "Portraits of Places," (1883,) "Female Poets and Novelists," (1878,) etc. His name is one of the foremost in recent American literature.

James, (JOHN ANGELL,) an eloquent English dissenting minister and popular writer, born at Blandford, Dorset, in 1785. He was for many years an Independent minister of Birmingham, and acquired great influence by his oral ministry and his numerous writings, which have had an immense circulation. Among his works are "The Anxious Inquirer," "Christian Fellowship," (11th edition, 1855,) "Family Monitor," (9th edition, 1848,) "The Church in Earnest," (4th edition, 1851,) and "Female Piety," (4th edition, 1855.) Died in 1859.

James, (JOHN THOMAS,) Bishop of Calcutta, born at Rugby in 1786. Upon the death of Bishop Heber he was appointed to the diocese of Calcutta, and sailed for India in 1827. He was the author of a "Tour through Germany, Sweden, Russia, and Poland," (1816,) "Treatise on the Italian, French, Dutch, and German Schools of Painting," (1822,) and "The Semi-Sceptic, or the Common Sense of Religion considered." Died in 1828.

See "Memoirs of Bishop James," by his brother, 1830.

James, (PAUL MOON,) an English poet, born in 1780. His short lyric "The Beacon," often attributed to Moore, is all that rescues him from oblivion. He was a banker in Birmingham, where he died in 1854.

James, (RICHARD,) an English divine, linguist, and traveller, and nephew of Thomas James, (1571–1629,) was born at Newport, in the Isle of Wight, in 1592. Among his works are manuscripts upon Russia, and a "Poem upon the Death of Sir Robert Cotton." Died in 1638.

James, (ROBERT,) an English physician, born in Staffordshire in 1703. He was the inventor of a celebrated fever-powder which bore his name, and the author of a "Medicinal Dictionary," (1743–45,) (in which he was assisted by Dr. Samuel Johnson,) treatises on the "Practice of Physic" and "On Canine Madness," and a "Dissertation on Fevers," (1778.) Died in 1776.

James, (THOMAS,) a learned divine, born at Newport, in the Isle of Wight, in 1571. He was distinguished as an able and industrious writer against the Catholics. Among the most important of his works are "A Treatise of the Corruptions of the Scriptures, Councils, and Fathers by the Church of Rome," (1612,) and "The Jesuits' Downfall." Died in 1629.

See WOOD, "Athenæ Oxonienses."

James, (THOMAS,) an English navigator, who sailed in 1631 in search of a northwest passage. He made some discoveries on the shores of Hudson's Bay, and to the country lying west of it he gave the name of New Wales. On his return to England he published "The Strange and Dangerous Voyage of Captain Thomas James for the Discovery of a Northwest Passage to the South Sea."

James, (THOMAS,) an English teacher, became headmaster of Rugby School in 1776. He published a "Compendium of Geography." He was the father of Bishop John T. James, noticed above. Died in 1804.

James, (THOMAS C.,) M.D., an American physician and scholar, born in Philadelphia in 1766. He graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1788, and followed his profession with eminent success in his native city. In 1811 he was appointed professor of midwifery in the above institution. Died in Philadelphia in 1835. He is said to have been versed in the Greek, Latin, French, and German languages, and to have possessed some acquaintance with the Hebrew. He contributed several short but beautiful poems to Dennie's "Portfolio."

See "Memoir of Thomas Chalkley James," by J. R. TYSON, Philadelphia, 1836; GROSS, "American Medical Biography;" CARSON, "History of the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania."

James, (THOMAS LEMUEL,) LL.D., an American statesman, born in Utica, New York, March 29, 1831. He learned the trade of a printer, was engaged in journalism, 1851–60, held positions in the New York custom-house, 1860–73, was postmaster of New York, 1873–81, postmaster-general of the United States, 1881–82, and afterwards was a bank-president in New York city.

James, (WILLIAM,) an English land-agent and surveyor, born in Warwickshire in 1771. He was the first to project the Manchester and Liverpool Railway, and is generally regarded as "the father" of the railway-system in England. Died in 1837.

James, (WILLIAM,) an Englishman, known as the author of "The Naval History of Great Britain from the Declaration of War by France in 1793 to the Accession of George IV. in 1820," (5 vols., 1822,) a work evincing great research. Died in 1827.

James, (Sir WILLIAM,) an English naval officer of high rank, born at Milford Haven about 1721. He distinguished himself in the East India service and in the American war. Died in 1785.

James (or Jacques, zhăk) de Vitri, (dẹh ve'tre',) a distinguished cardinal and historical writer, born at Vitri, near Paris, in the twelfth century. He preached against the Albigenses, and about 1218 joined the crusade against the Saracens. He wrote, besides other works, a "History of the East and West." Died in 1240.

James (or Giacomo, jä'ko-mo) de Voragine, (dà vo-rä'je-nà,) a Romish prelate, born at Voraggio, near Genoa, about 1230. In 1292 he was ordained Archbishop of Genoa. Died in 1298. He wrote various ecclesiastical works, and a famous collection of the lives of the saints, entitled the "Golden Legend."

James Francis Edward, called the first Pretender, and Chevalier de Saint George, born in 1688, was the son and heir of James II. of England. He was educated in France, and was a Roman Catholic. At the death of his father he was recognized as King of England by Louis XIV. He entered the French army, and charged at the head of the cavalry at Malplaquet in 1709. Lord Bolingbroke formed a design to secure for him the succession to the throne, but was defeated by the death of Queen Anne. In 1715 the Scottish Jacobites took arms to assert the title of the Pretender, and, under the command of the Earl of Mar, were defeated at Sheriffmuir. Another army of his partisans surrendered at Preston. James Francis Edward landed in Scotland in December, 1715; but, finding his cause in a desperate state, he returned to France the next month. Died in 1758 or 1765.

Jā'mẹ-sọn, (ANNA,) a celebrated writer, born in Dublin in 1797, was the daughter of Mr. Murphy, a painter. She married in 1824 a barrister named Jameson, with whom she went to live in Canada; but, various circumstances causing a separation, Mrs. Jameson returned to England, to employ herself in literature and the fine arts. She was an earnest labourer for the fuller development of the usefulness and mental culture of the women of England. Her productions evince great discrimination, learning, and refinement. Among the most important of these we may mention "The Diary of an Ennuyée," (1826,) afterwards enlarged and published with the title of "Visits and Sketches at Home and Abroad," (2 vols., 1834,) "Loves of the Poets," (1829,) "Memoirs of Celebrated Female Sovereigns," (2 vols., 1831,) "The Beauties of the Court of Charles II.," "Lives of the Early Italian Painters," (2 vols., 1845,) and "The Poetry of Sacred and Legendary Art," (2 vols., 1848.) Died in 1860.

Jā'mẹ-sọn, (CHARLES DAVIS,) an American general, born at Gorham, Maine, in 1827. He distinguished himself at the battle of Bull Run, with the rank of colonel, July, 1861, and commanded a brigade at Fair Oaks, May, 1862. Died at Oldtown, Maine, in November, 1862.

Jā'mẹ-sọn, (ROBERT,) an eminent Scottish naturalist, born at Leith in 1774 or 1773. He published "Mineralogy of the Scottish Isles," (2 vols., 1800,) "A System of Mineralogy," (3 vols., 1804–08,) and other works. He was professor of natural history in the University of Edinburgh from 1804 until 1854. In 1819 Professor Jameson and Sir David Brewster founded the "Edinburgh Philosophical Journal," which the former edited many years. He also contributed to the "Encyclopædia Britannica." He had a high reputation as a professor. Died in 1854.

See "Edinburgh Review" for October, 1804, and April, 1805; "Annual Register" for 1854.

Jā'mẹ-sọne, (GEORGE,) an eminent painter, called "the Van Dyck of Scotland," was born at Aberdeen in 1586. About 1616 he went to Antwerp, where, with Van Dyck, he studied under Rubens. "His excellence," says Walpole, "consisted in delicacy and softness, with a clear and beautiful colouring." It is said that, in 1633, when Charles I. visited Edinburgh, the magistrates of that city employed Jamesone to paint the portraits of some of the Scottish monarchs. Charles was so much pleased with the result that he sat for his own portrait, and presented the artist with a diamond ring from his finger. Jameson was also a painter of historical and landscape scenes. Died in 1644.

Janauschek, yȧ′nŏw-shĕk′, (FRANCESCA MADELINA ROMANCE, called FANNY,) a tragic actress of rare talents, born in Prague, Bohemia, July 20, 1830. She appears in both English and German plays, but her principal successes have been won in Germany.

Jane OF NAVARRE. See JOAN.

Janes, jānz, (EDMUND S.,) a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Sheffield, Massachusetts, in 1807. In early life he was principal of an academy in New Jersey. About 1836 he became minister of a church in Philadelphia, and in 1839 was transferred to Mulberry Street Church, in New York. He was chosen in 1841 financial secretary of the American Bible Society, and travelled through most of the States in pleading the cause of the Bible. He was elected a bishop in 1844. Died September 18, 1876.

Janet, a French painter. See CLOUET.

Janet, zhȧ′nȧ′, or Janet-Lange, zhȧ′nȧ′ lôNzh, (ANGE LOUIS,) a French painter, born in Paris, November 19, 1818. A pupil of Ingres, Collin, and Vernet, he became noted for his military pieces, and not less so for those on religious subjects. Died at Paris, November 25, 1872.

Janet, (PAUL,) an eminent French philosopher, born at Paris, April 30, 1823. He held professorships of philosophy at Bourges and Strasburg, and later at the Sorbonne. His position is that of an acceptor of science who at the same time rejects materialism and defends the old philosophy. Among his numerous works are "Éléments de Morale," (1869,) and "La Philosophie française contemporaine," (1879.)

Jāne′way, (JAMES,) an English nonconformist divine, born in Hertfordshire in 1636. He was a preacher of great power, and was very actively employed at the time of the plague both in the pulpit and in visiting the sick. He wrote a "Life of John Janeway," his brother, and "The Saint's Encouragement to Diligence," (1675.) Died in 1674.

Jani, yȧ′nee, (CHRISTIAN DAVID,) a German philologist, born near Halle in 1743. He published a good edition of Horace, (2 vols., 1778–82,) and other works. Died in 1790.

Janiçon, zhȧ′ne′sôN′, (FRANÇOIS MICHEL,) a noted journalist, born in Paris in 1674. Being an avowed Protestant, he went to receive his education in Holland, which became his adopted country. In early life he entered the army, but finally devoted himself to literature. Among his works are "Present State of the Republic of the United Provinces and their Dependencies," (1729,) a production of great merit, and "Serious and Satirical Letters upon the Works of the Savants," (12 vols., 1740 et seq.) Died in 1730.

Jan′ney, (SAMUEL M.,) an American writer, born in Loudon county, Virginia, January 11, 1801. Both his parents were members of the Society of Friends, or Quakers; and his mind appears to have been at an early age deeply impressed with the truth and high importance of the religious principles in which he was educated. Besides some smaller works, he wrote "Conversations on Religious Subjects," (1835;) "A Teacher's Gift, consisting of Essays in Prose and Verse," (1840;) "An Historical Sketch of the Christian Church during the Middle Ages," (1847,) and two valuable biographies, viz., a "Life of William Penn," (1852,) and a "Life of George Fox," (1855.) His last and most important publication is a "History of the Religious Society of Friends from its Rise to the Year 1828," (4 vols., 1867.) This work treats, among other subjects, of the causes and events of the separation which occurred in the Society in 1827–28. The writer belonged to the anti-orthodox division of the Quakers; and, though not professing strict impartiality, he evinced, in his treatment of this delicate and difficult subject, great moderation, a scrupulous regard for the facts of the case, and, on the whole, a liberal and kindly spirit. He was a highly-esteemed minister of the Society of which he was a member. Early in 1869 he was appointed by President Grant superintendent of Indian affairs in the Northern Superintendency. Died April 30, 1880.

Jännicke, yĕn'nik-kẹh, (JOHANN FRIEDRICH,) a German author, born at Frankfort-on-the-Main, January 7, 1831. He became a prominent railway official. He published "Hand-Book of Aquarelle-Painting," "Hand-Book of Oil-Painting," "Principles of Ceramic Art," "Summary of the Literature of Ceramics," and other works, partly on entomology.

Janozki, yä-nozh'kee, or Janotzki, yä-nots'kee, sometimes written Janisck, (JOHN DANIEL,) a Polish or Russian author, born at Viborg in 1720. He was appointed superintendent of the Zaluski Library at Warsaw. Among his works, which principally relate to the literature of Poland, are "Letters on Criticism," "A Dictionary of the Living Authors of Poland," and "Polish Literature of our Time." Died in 1786.

Jansemin. See JASMIN.

Jansen, jan'sẹn or yän'sẹn, or Jan-se'nĭ-us, [Dutch pron. yän-sā'ne-ŭs,] (CORNELIS,) Bishop of Ypres, celebrated as the founder of the sect of Jansenists, born near Leerdam, in Holland, in October, 1585. He pursued his studies at Paris, and in 1617 was chosen professor of divinity in the University of Louvain. About 1634 he bitterly attacked the French government, in his "Mars Gallicus," for having formed a treaty of alliance with the Dutch Protestants. This provoked the enmity of Cardinal Richelieu, but obtained the favour of the King of Spain, who raised Jansenius to the see of Ypres in 1635. His principal production was entitled "Augustinus," (Louvain, 1640,) in which he advocated the doctrines of Saint Augustine in regard to the atonement, divine grace, free will, and predestination. This work was finished a short time previous to his death, in 1638, and by his will he referred it to the judgment of the Holy See; but his executors published the book, and suppressed that part of the will which related to it. The opinions which he advocated were directly opposed to those advanced by the Jesuits, who made great efforts to obtain a decision against them by the pope. Finally the bishops of France reduced the doctrines of Jansenius to five propositions for condemnation,—viz.: 1. That there are divine precepts which good men are unable to obey for want of God's grace, although desirous to do so. 2. That no person can resist the influence of divine grace when bestowed. 3. That for human actions to be meritorious, it is not requisite that they should be exempt from necessity, but only from constraint. 4. That the Semi-Pelagians err grievously in maintaining that the human will is endowed with power of either receiving or resisting the aids and influences of preventive grace. 5. That whoever maintains that Jesus Christ made expiation by his sufferings and death for the sins of all mankind is a Semi-Pelagian. Innocent X. condemned the first four of these propositions as simply heretical, but the last as rash, impious, and injurious to the Supreme Being. Many bulls were also issued by the succeeding popes, by which the Jansenists, several of whom were among the most learned and eminent ecclesiastics of France, were deprived of office and declared to be heretics. Louis XIV., at the instigation of his Jesuit confessor, ordered them to be persecuted and their monastery at Port-Royal to be suppressed. Notwithstanding these attempts to crush them, the Jansenists continued to increase, comprising among their champions Pascal, Arnauld, Nicole, and many other celebrated men.

Jansen, yän'sẹn, (HENDRIK,) a noted writer and translator, born at the Hague in 1741. He fixed his residence in Paris about 1770, where he became librarian to Talleyrand. His works were chiefly of a historical and philosophical character. Died in 1812.

Jansenius. See JANSEN.

Jansenius, yän-sā'ne-us, (CORNELIS,) a learned Flemish ecclesiastic, born at Hulst in 1510. In 1568 he was ordained first Bishop of Ghent. Of his works we may mention "Concord of the Evangelists," and a "Paraphrase on the Psalms." Died in 1576.

Jansenius, (JAKOB,) a Dutch scholar, born at Amsterdam in 1547, became in 1595 regius professor of the Sacred Scriptures at Louvain. Among his works are Expositions of the Prophet Job, of the Psalms of David, and of the Gospel of John. Died in 1625.

Janson, yän'sọn, (KRISTOFFER NAGEL,) a Norwegian poet, born at Bergen, May 5, 1841. He published several volumes of poetry and novels, including "Torgrim," (1862,) "Fraa Bygdom," (1865,) "Han og ho," (1868,) and "Norske Digt," (1867.) He wrote "Fra Dansketidi," (1875,) a novel, and other works, including the strongly effective drama "A Woman's Fate," (1879.) In 1882 he became a Unitarian preacher. In 1884 he removed to Minneapolis, Minnesota.

Janson or Jenson, zhôn'sôn', (NICOLAS,) a French engraver, printer, and type-founder, settled in Venice about 1470. He produced there a number of celebrated editions between 1470 and 1480. He is called the inventor of the Roman type now generally used. Died about 1481.

See G. SARDINI, "Esame su i Principj della Francesa ed Italiana Tipografia, ovvero Storia critica di N. Jenson," 3 vols., 1796–98.

Janssen, yäns'sẹn, or John'son, (CORNELIS,) a noted artist, born in Amsterdam in 1590. In 1618 he visited England, where he was employed by James I. to paint the portraits of the royal family. He was also patronized by the nobility. He possessed neither the freedom nor the grace of Van Dyck, but in other respects was regarded as his equal, and in finishing was considered even superior to him. His carnations have been particularly admired; and his pictures yet retain their original lustre, in consequence perhaps of the ultramarine which he used. Died in 1665.

Janssen, yäns'sẹn, (JOHANNES,) MONSIGNOR, a German priest and historian, born at Xanten, April 10, 1829. He was educated at Louvain, Bonn, and Berlin, and in 1880 was made a prothonotary to the pope. Among his numerous works is a "History of the German People," (1876; 3d vol., 1884,) written from the ultramontane stand-point. Died December 23, 1891.

Janssen, zhôn'sôn', (PIERRE JULES CÉSAR,) a French astronomer and physicist, born in Paris, February 22, 1824. He held professorships in the Lycée Charlemagne and the École spéciale d'Architecture, and in 1875 was appointed director of the observatory at Meudon. He is very eminent as a student of solar physics.

Janssens, yäns'sẹns, (ABRAHAM,) a celebrated painter, born at Antwerp in 1569. His designs were elegant and spirited. He was a good colorist, and a rival of Rubens. He excelled in painting subjects illuminated by torches, where the brilliant light and deepest shade were placed in a striking contrast. His most important works are the "Resurrection of Lazarus," and a "Descent from the Cross." Died at Antwerp in 1631.

Janssens, (ERASMUS,) a Dutch Unitarian theologian, born about 1540, preached at Clausemburg. Died after 1595.

Jans'sens, (Dutch pron. yâns'sens,) (FRANCIS,) D.D., a Roman Catholic bishop, born at Tilburg, Netherlands, October 17, 1843. He was educated at the American College, Louvain, was ordained a Catholic priest in 1867, came to America in 1868, and was appointed vicar-general of Richmond, Virginia, in 1872, and Bishop of Natchez in 1881.

Janssens, (JAN WILLEM,) a distinguished Dutch general, born at Nymwegen in 1762. In 1802 he was appointed governor and general-in-chief of the colony of the Cape of Good Hope, where he was defeated by the English, who took possession of that country in 1806. After the abdication of Louis Bonaparte, under whom he had held the office of minister of war, Napoleon made him Governor-General of Holland and the East Indies. In this capacity he bravely defended Batavia against the English in 1811, but was finally obliged to surrender. Died in 1835.

Janssens, (VICTOR HONORIUS,) a noted Flemish painter, born at Brussels in 1664. He studied in Rome the works of Raphael, selected Albano for his model, and excelled all his contemporaries in that style. At the expiration of eleven years he returned to Brussels, where he painted numerous large pictures for palaces and churches. Died in 1739.

Jan-u-ā'rĭ-us, [Fr. JANVIER, zhŏn'vē-ā'; It. JANUARIO, yä-noo-â're-o,] SAINT, Bishop of Benevento, was beheaded during the persecution of Diocletian, about 305. A cathedral was erected over his grave at Naples, where it is believed that his blood exerts great power in checking the eruptions of Vesuvius.

Jā'nus, an ancient Latin deity, represented with two faces. He was regarded as the opener of the day and as having charge of the gates of heaven.* He seems to have presided over the commencement of enterprises. The word Janua ("gate") is said by some to have been derived from him; also the name of the month January. The temple of Janus Quirinus at Rome was kept open in time of war and closed during peace. It has been conjectured by some scholars that the name and attributes of Janus may be traced to Ganêsa, (or Ganêsha,) the Hindoo deity of prudence and circumspection, who, among his other offices, had those of presiding over the commencement of undertakings, guarding gates and doors, etc.

Japix, Japicx, or Japiks, yä'piks, (GYSBERT,) a celebrated Frisian poet, born at Bolsward in 1603. But few incidents in his early life are known. Japix was the first, and in fact the only, writer in Frisian of any note of that period. In 1763, at Dr. Johnson's request, Boswell, then at Utrecht, sent a copy of Japix as a specimen of Frisian, and at the same time remarked that "it was the only book which they had; that there were no treatises of devotion, ballads, or story-books in the language." Japix died of the plague in 1666.

See HALBERTSMA, "Hulde aan G. Japiks," 1827; "Foreign Quarterly Review" for January, 1829.

* Some writers suppose Janus to be a corruption of Dianus, (from Dies, "Day,") because he was the opener of the day.

Japp, jăp, (ALEXANDER HAY,) LL.D., a Scottish author, known by the pseudonym of H. A. PAGE. He was born at Dun, near Montrose, in 1839, and graduated at the University of Edinburgh. He was editor of the "Sunday Magazine." His works include "Lives" of Hawthorne, (1870,) De Quincey, (1877,) and Thoreau, (1878,) "Golden Lives," (1871,) "Noble Workers," (1873,) "Out and About," (fables, 1874,) "German Life and Literature," etc.

Jars, zhȧR, (GABRIEL,) a distinguished mineralogist, and member of the French Academy of Sciences, born at Lyons, in France, in 1732. In 1757 he was sent to examine the mines of Germany and Hungary, and in 1765 visited England, Scotland, Norway, and Sweden for the same purpose. He died in 1769, leaving manuscripts from which his brother compiled "Observations upon a Great Number of Gold and Silver Mines," (3 vols., 1774–81.)

See QUÉRARD, "La France Littéraire."

Jars, de, dẹh zhȧR, (FRANÇOIS DE Rochechouart—rosh'shoo-ȧR',) CHEVALIER, a French officer and courtier. He was arrested by Cardinal Richelieu in 1632, because he refused to give evidence in the prosecution of his friend Châteauneuf, keeper of the seals. After an imprisonment of eleven months in the Bastille, and twenty-four examinations, during which nothing could be extorted from him that would criminate Châteauneuf, he was convicted on false evidence and sentenced to death. A reprieve, however, arrived from the king after Jars had placed his head upon the block. He obtained his liberty after a long imprisonment. Died in 1670.

See RICHELIEU, "Mémoires."

Jar'vęs, (JAMES JACKSON,) a writer and traveller, born in Boston, Massachusetts, in 1818. He produced, besides other works, a "History of the Hawaiian or Sandwich Islands," (1843,) "Scenes and Scenery in the Sandwich Islands," (1844,) "Art Hints," (1855,) afterwards enlarged and republished as "Art Studies," "The Art Idea, Sculpture, Painting, and Architecture in America," (1865,) "Art Thoughts," (1869,) and "Italian Rambles," (1883.) Died in Switzerland in 1888.

Jā'sǫn, [Gr. Ἰάσων,] a semi-fabulous Greek hero, celebrated as the leader of the Argonautic expedition, which was supposed to have occurred before the siege of Troy. The Argonauts went to Colchis to fetch a golden fleece which was guarded by a dragon. Jason succeeded in this enterprise by the aid of Medea, a sorceress, whom he married. (See MEDEA.)

Jason, tyrant of Pheræ, and chief magistrate of Thessaly, was ambitious and enterprising. He obtained control of Thessaly in 374 B.C., and aspired to be master of all Greece. He was assassinated in 369 B.C.

Jas'per, (WILLIAM,) (known in history as SERGEANT JASPER,) a brave soldier of the American Revolution, born in South Carolina about 1750. When the American flag was shot away in the attack on Fort Moultrie, June 28, 1776, he leaped outside the walls of the fort, amidst a perfect storm of cannon-shot, replaced the flag, and returned to his post without injury. For this gallant service Governor Rutledge presented to him his own sword. He afterwards served with distinction under Marion, and was killed at Savannah in October, 1779.

Jastrow, yȧs'trov, (MARCUS MORDECAI,) Ph.D., a Jewish scholar, born at Rogasen, Prussian Poland, June 5, 1829. He studied at Posen, Berlin, and Halle, graduating at the latter university in 1856, was preacher at Warsaw, 1858–62, and rabbi at Mannheim, Warsaw, and Worms, 1862–66, in which year he removed to the United States and became a rabbi in Philadelphia. His principal works are "Lectures," in Polish, (1862,) "Jewish Laws," in Polish, (1859,) "Four Hundred Years of Jewish History," (1865,) "Episodes of Jewish History," and a "Complete Talmudic Dictionary," a colossal work, not yet finished.

Jászay, yȧ'sī, (PAUL, or PÁL,) a Hungarian historian, born at Szántó in 1809. He became a secretary to the Batthyányi ministry, and died in 1852. He wrote two valuable histories,—"The History of the Hungarian People after the Battle of Mohács," (1846, incomplete,) and "History of the Hungarian People from the Oldest Times to the Publication of the Golden Bull," (1855.)

Jaubert, zhō'bair', (FRANÇOIS,) COMTE, a French lawyer, born at Condom in 1758. In 1804 he became president of the Tribunate. In 1806 he was appointed councillor of state. Died in 1822.

Jaubert, (HIPPOLYTE FRANÇOIS,) a French minister of state, and naturalist, a nephew of the preceding, was born in Paris in 1798. He became minister of public works in 1840. He published "Illustrationes Plantarum Orientalium," (2 vols., 1842–46.) Died Dec. 5, 1874.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Jaubert, (PIERRE AMÉDÉE ÉMILIEN PROBE,) a French Orientalist, born in Provence in 1779, accompanied Napoleon to Egypt as first secretary-interpreter in 1799. He was appointed, after his return, professor of Persian in the College of France, was elected to the Academy of Inscriptions in 1830, and made a peer of France in 1841. He contributed to the "Journal Asiatique," and wrote a number of learned works. Died in 1847.

Jaucourt, de, dẹh zhō'koor', (ARNAIL FRANÇOIS,) MARQUIS, a French politician, born in Paris in 1757, was a moderate member of the Legislative Assembly in 1791. In June, 1814, he acted as minister of foreign affairs in the absence of Talleyrand. He founded the Protestant Bible Society of Paris. Died in 1852.

Jaucourt, de, (Louis, Chevalier,) an accomplished French writer and scholar, born in Paris in 1704. He studied at Geneva, Cambridge, and Leyden, and was a pupil of Boerhaave in medicine. He published in 1734 a "History of the Life and Works of Leibnitz," which is much admired. He wrote many articles on natural philosophy, natural history, literature, etc. for the great French Encyclopædia of Diderot. His principles were more consistent with the Christian religion than those of the other Encyclopædists. He wrote a voluminous Medical Lexicon, but lost the manuscript at sea, and contributed largely to the "Bibliothèque raisonnée des Ouvrages des Savants de l'Europe," (1728–40.) Died at Compiègne in 1779.

Jay, (Harriett,) an English novelist and actress, born near London, September 22, 1857. She published "The Queen of Connaught," (1875,) "Dark Colleen," (1876,) "Two Men and a Maid," (1881,) and other works. She went upon the stage in 1881. She was a sister-in-law of Robert Buchanan, and became his second wife in 1884.

Jay, (John,) an illustrious American statesman, first chief justice of the United States, was born in New York, December 12, 1745. He was descended on his father's side from Pierre Jay, a Huguenot merchant of La Rochelle, who fled to England on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Jay graduated at King's (now Columbia) College in 1764, and was admitted to the bar of New York in 1768. At this period he combined in a remarkable degree the dignity and gravity of manhood with the ardour of youth. His talents soon procured for him both an extensive legal practice and great influence in the political assemblies called to consider the aggressive policy of the British government. Elected to the first Continental Congress at Philadelphia in 1774, he took a leading part in all its proceedings, and, as one of a committee of three, drew up the address to the people of Great Britain, which at once procured for its author the reputation of being one of the ablest and most eloquent writers in America. He also prepared the address issued by Congress in 1775 to the people of Canada. In the general debates he took strong ground in favour of the central authority and against separate colonial action. Having been recalled from Philadelphia in May, 1776, to take part in the deliberations of the New York provincial Congress, his name does not appear on the Declaration of Independence, which, however, received his cordial support. He exerted great influence in the convention which met in August of the same year to frame a State government for New York. To arouse the people from the despondency occasioned by the disasters to our arms, he prepared, in December, an address to the country, which was issued by the convention and ordered by Congress to be translated into German. He also reported to the New York convention, in March, 1777, a bill of rights, and had a chief share in framing the Constitution. Before its adjournment, May, 1777, the convention appointed Jay chief justice of New York.

In December, 1778, he again took his seat in Congress, and a few days after was chosen its president. His dignified and impartial discharge of the duties of this position won the esteem of all parties. In September, 1779, he resigned the offices both of president and chief justice, to accept the appointment of minister to Spain to negotiate for a loan of $5,000,000 and for the free navigation of the Mississippi. After many months of vexatious and fruitless labours at Madrid, he proceeded to Paris, and took part with Adams, Franklin, and others in negotiating the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain, signed September 3, 1783. Jay returned to New York in July, 1784, and, learning that Congress had already appointed him secretary of foreign affairs, then probably the most important office in the government, he accepted this position in December following, and discharged its duties until the election of Washington as President of the United States in 1789. To answer the objections of the opponents to the Federal Constitution as it came from the General Convention of 1787, Jay united with Hamilton and Madison in writing "The Federalist." "No constitution of government," says Chancellor Kent, "ever received a more masterly and successful vindication." Jay contributed greatly towards overcoming the majority against the Constitution in the New York convention called to adopt or reject it in 1788, (at first the vote stood only eleven for, to forty-six against; afterwards thirty for, to twenty-seven against,) and on the reorganization of the government under it in 1789 he was offered by Washington, it is said, the choice of the offices in his gift. He accepted that of chief justice of the supreme court. "His general learning and ability," says Daniel Webster, "and especially the prudence, the mildness, and the firmness of his character, eminently fitted Mr. Jay to be at the head of such a court." In 1792 Jay received a majority of the votes for Governor of New York; but, on some technical grounds, George Clinton, the Republican candidate, was declared elected. In writing of this result to his wife, he said, "A few years will put us all in the dust; and then it will be of more importance to me to have governed myself than to have governed a State." In 1794 Jay accepted with reluctance the appointment of special minister to England to negotiate a settlement of the difficulties between the two countries, well knowing that in the state of public feeling no adjustment that could be effected would give satisfaction to all parties. He concluded a treaty on the 19th of November of the same year. It provided, among other things, that pre-revolutionary debts owed to British subjects should be paid by the United States, that the British government should indemnify Americans for losses sustained by illegal captures, etc. (About $10,000,000 were afterwards paid on this account.)

This treaty was at once assailed with almost unexampled violence by the party favourable to France. Mobs lighted bonfires with it in the principal cities, and in Boston Jay himself was burned in effigy. On the other hand, Hamilton defended the treaty with an ability that extorted the admiration even of its opponents, and Fisher Ames, in one of the greatest efforts of American eloquence, declared that the "treaty had justly raised the character of the nation." It was finally carried into effect by a vote of fifty-eight to fifty-one. While Jay was absent in England, he was elected, without his knowledge or consent, Governor of New York,—an office which he held for six years. It was under his administration that slavery in that State was abolished. In writing to a friend, in 1780, he had declared, "Till America comes into this measure, [the abolition of slavery,] her prayers to Heaven for liberty will be impious." Five years later (1785) he was made president of a society in New York "to promote the manumission of slaves." Having declined a re-election at the close of his second gubernatorial term, Jay was nominated and confirmed by the Senate to succeed Oliver Ellsworth in his former office of chief justice of the United States; but this honour he also declined, and for the remainder of his life resided on his estate at Bedford, Westchester county, New York. He died May 17, 1829. "In lofty disinterestedness," says Hildreth, "in unyielding integrity, in superiority to the illusions of passion, no one of the great men of the Revolution approached so near to Washington," (as Jay.) Jay was a member of the Episcopal Church, and was a man of deep religious as well as earnest moral convictions; the Bible is said to have been his constant study. In stature he was somewhat less than six feet in height; he was well formed, but rather thin, face colourless, with deep-blue eyes, and aquiline nose.

Jay, (JOHN,) an eminent lawyer, a grandson of the preceding, and a son of Judge William Jay, was born in New York in 1817. He graduated at Columbia College in 1836, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1839. He distinguished himself as an opponent of slavery, and was counsel for several fugitive slaves in the courts of law. From 1869 to 1875 he was minister to Austria under President Grant. He was twice chosen president of the Union League of New York. Died May 5, 1894.

Jay, (WILLIAM,) a popular English dissenting minister and writer, born at Tisbury, Wiltshire, in 1769. He was the pupil and protégé of the Rev. Cornelius Winter. He began to preach about the age of sixteen, and became in 1791 minister of Argyle Chapel, Bath, where he continued to preach for sixty-two years. He was called the "prince of preachers" by the eminent John Foster. Among his works are "Morning and Evening Exercises," (1842;) "Lectures on Female Scripture Characters," (1854;) a "Life of Cornelius Winter," "Mornings with Jesus," (1854;) and "Evenings with Jesus," (1854.) Died in December, 1853.

See his Autobiography, edited by GEORGE REDFORD and JOHN ANGELL JAMES, 1854; "Memoir of William Jay," by S. S. WILSON, 1854.

Jay, (WILLIAM,) an American philanthropist, second son of Chief-Justice Jay, was born in New York in 1789. He graduated at Yale in 1807, and on the death of his father, in 1829, succeeded to the family estate at Bedford. He had previously, in 1820, been appointed first judge of Westchester county, in which office he was continued till superseded, in 1842, on account of his anti-slavery opinions. He early entered upon his philanthropic labours, and continued to exert himself in behalf of the temperance reform, the abolition of slavery, educational and missionary enterprises, Sunday-schools, tract and Bible societies, etc., for the remainder of his life. He was for several years the president of the American Peace Society, and was one of the chief founders of the American Bible Society. His principal works are the "Life of John Jay, with Selections from his Writings," (2 vols., 1833;) "An Inquiry into the Character and Tendency of the American Colonization and American Anti-Slavery Societies," (1835;) "A View of the Action of the Federal Government in behalf of Slavery," (1839;) "War and Peace," (1842;) and "A Review of the Causes and Consequences of the Mexican War," (1849.) Died at Bedford, New York, in 1858.

Jeanes, jeenz, (HENRY,) an English divine, born at Allerton, in Somersetshire, in 1613. He wrote a treatise on "Abstinence from Evil," one entitled "The Image Unbroken," (1650,) in defence of Charles I., and a work in reply to the "Iconoclastes" of Milton. Died in 1660.

Jeanne d'Albret, zhȧn dȧl'brā', or Joan, Queen of Navarre, born in 1528, was the only child of Henri d'Albret, King of Navarre, and Marguerite, sister of the French monarch Francis I. Her earliest suitor was Philip, the son of Charles V. of Germany; but Francis I. opposed the union, and gave her in marriage to Antoine de Bourbon, Duke of Vendôme, in 1548. Through her husband's influence she embraced the Calvinistic faith, caused it to be introduced into Navarre, and in a short time was regarded as one of the chief supporters of Protestantism in France. On the 13th of December, 1553, she gave birth to a son, afterwards known as the illustrious Henry IV. In 1555, with her husband, she succeeded to the sovereignty of Navarre. Two years later, her husband, having been appointed lieutenant-general of France, was killed at the siege of Rouen. Jeanne died at Paris in 1572. She was distinguished for her talents, virtues, and heroic qualities.

Jeannin, zhȧ′nȧN′, (PIERRE,) a French statesman and diplomatist of high reputation, born at Autun in 1540. He held an office at Dijon in 1572, when a royal order came for the massacre of the Protestants. Although he was a zealous Catholic, he persuaded the local authorities to disobey or suspend the execution of the order, which in a few days was countermanded. He afterwards became president of the Parliament of Dijon. In 1594 he gave his adhesion to Henry IV., who employed him on important foreign missions. He gained the confidence of the king in a high degree. After the death of Henry IV., (1610,) the queen, Marie de Médicis, appointed Jeannin controller of the finances, and confided to him the chief direction of affairs. He died in 1622, leaving "Memoirs of his Negotiations," (1656.)

Jebb, (JOHN,) M.D., a celebrated divine, born in London in 1736. In 1768 he delivered a course of lectures on the Greek Testament at Cambridge. He obtained the living of Ovington, in Norfolk, in 1764, and became chaplain to the Earl of Harborough. Having subsequently embraced Socinian views, he resigned all his ecclesiastical appointments and commenced the study of medicine. He obtained his degree at Saint Andrew's, and practised with success. He was much engaged in political controversy, and earnestly advocated the American cause during the Revolutionary war. Died in 1786.

See DISNEY, "Life of John Jebb," 1787.

Jebb, (JOHN,) an Irish Protestant bishop and classical scholar, born at Drogheda in 1775, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He published, in 1819 or 1820, an important work on "Sacred Literature," which is highly praised by several critics. "It has the highest claims," says T. H. Horne, "to the attention of every biblical student." In 1823 he was appointed Bishop of Limerick. Among his works is "Practical Theology," (2 vols., 1830.) Died in 1833.

See CHARLES FORSTER, "Life of Bishop Jebb," 2 vols., 1837.

Jebb, (Sir RICHARD,) BART., son of Dr. Samuel Jebb, noticed below, was born at Stratford, in Essex, in 1729. He studied medicine in London, and afterwards at the University of Leyden, where he obtained the degree of M.D. He became physician-extraordinary to George III. about 1777, and physician-in-ordinary to the Prince of Wales in 1780. Died in 1787.

He was educated at the Charterhouse, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1862 and received a Fellowship. In 1875 he was made Greek professor in Glasgow University. Among his works are "The Attic Orators," "Modern Greece," "Primer of Greek Literature," a "Life of R. Bentley," and important editions of the texts of various Greek authors, with notes.

Jebb, (SAMUEL,) M.D., a noted English physician and classical scholar, born in Nottinghamshire, was an uncle of John Jebb, M.D., noticed above. He embraced the principles of the nonjurors, and became librarian to the celebrated Jeremy Collier. He edited the "Dialogue of Justin Martyr with Trypho the Jew, in Greek and Latin," the "Opus Majus" of Roger Bacon, and several other works. Died in 1772.

Jee-jeeb-hoy′, (Sir JAMSETJEE,) BART., a Parsee merchant, born in Bombay, July 15, 1783. He acquired great wealth as a merchant, and was distinguished for his remarkable benevolence and large charities. He was made a baronet in 1857, and died April 15, 1859. His son, of the same name and titles, (born 1811, died July 11, 1877,) was also distinguished for his charities and public spirit. The third baronet of this name was born March 3, 1851, and before his succession to the title bore the name of Manockjee Cursetjee.

Jef′fẽr-sọn, (JOSEPH,) a distinguished comedian, born in Philadelphia, of a family of actors, February 20, 1829. In early youth he went upon the stage, and rapidly rose to a very high rank in his profession. The characters of "Rip Van Winkle" and "Bob Eccles" are those in which he has attained the greatest celebrity.

Jefferson, (THOMAS,) an eminent American statesman, and the third President of the United States, was born, April 2, 1743, at Shadwell, Virginia, near the spot which afterwards became his residence with the name of Monticello. He was the oldest son in a family of eight children. His father, Peter Jefferson, was a man of great force of character and of extraordinary physical strength. His mother, Jane Randolph, of Goochland, was descended from an English family of great respectability. Young Jefferson began his classical studies at the age of nine, and at seventeen he entered an advanced class at William and Mary College. On his way thither he formed the acquaintance of Patrick Henry, who was then a bankrupt merchant, but who afterwards became the great orator of the Revolution. At college Jefferson was distinguished by his close application, and devoted, it is said, from twelve to fifteen hours a day to study. He became well versed, we are told, in Latin, Greek, Italian, French, and Spanish, making at the same time a respectable proficiency in his mathematical studies. After a five years' course of law under Judge Wythe, he was admitted to the bar in 1767. His success in the legal profession was remarkable; his fees for the first year amounted to nearly three thousand dollars. In 1769 Jefferson commenced his public career as a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses, in which he had, while a student of law, listened to Patrick Henry's great speech on the Stamp Act.

In 1773 he united with Patrick Henry and other patriots in devising the celebrated committee of correspondence for disseminating intelligence between the colonies, of which Jefferson was one of the most active and influential members. Elected the next year to a convention to choose delegates to the first Continental Congress at Philadelphia, he drew up for their instruction his famous "Summary View of the Rights of British America," which, though rejected by the convention as being too radical, was subsequently issued by the House of Burgesses, and, after some revision by Edmund Burke, passed through several editions in Great Britain. June 1, 1775, Jefferson reported to the Assembly the reply of Virginia to Lord North's conciliatory proposition, and on the 21st of the same month took his seat in the Continental Congress. His reputation as a statesman and accomplished writer at once placed him among the leaders of that renowned body. He served on the most important committees, and, among other labours, drew up the reply of Congress to the above proposal of Lord North, and assisted John Dickinson in preparing, in behalf of the Colonies, a declaration of the cause of taking up arms. The rejection of a final petition to the king having at length destroyed all hope of an honourable reconciliation with the mother-country, Congress, early in the session of 1776, appointed a committee to draw up a declaration of independence, of which Jefferson was made chairman. In this capacity he drafted, at the request of the other members of the committee, (Franklin, Adams, Sherman, and R. R. Livingston,) and reported to Congress, June 28, that great charter of freedom known as the "Declaration of American Independence," which, on July 4, was adopted unanimously, and signed by every member present except John Dickinson of Pennsylvania. It may be doubted if in all history there be recorded so important an event, or if a state paper has ever been framed that has exerted, or is destined to exert, so great an influence on the destinies of a large portion of the human race. The Declaration of Independence, says Edward Everett, "is equal to anything ever born on parchment or expressed in the visible signs of thought." "The heart of Jefferson in writing it," adds Bancroft,

"and of Congress in adopting it, beat for all humanity." In October following, Jefferson resigned his seat in Congress, and also the appointment of commissioner to France, to take part in the deliberations of the Virginia Assembly. A State Constitution had previously been adopted, to which he had furnished the preamble; and he now applied himself to a radical revision of the laws of the commonwealth, in which he was engaged for two years and a half. Among other reforms, he procured the repeal of the laws of entail, the abolition of primogeniture, and the restoration of the rights of conscience,—reforms which, he believed, would eradicate "every fibre of ancient or future aristocracy." He also originated a complete system of elementary and collegiate education for Virginia.

In June, 1779, Jefferson succeeded Patrick Henry as Governor of Virginia, and held the office during the most gloomy period of the Revolution. He declined a re-election in 1781, assigning as a reason that at that critical juncture "the public would have more confidence in a military chief." Two days after retiring from office, his estate at Elk Hill was laid waste, and he and his family narrowly escaped capture by the enemy. Jefferson was twice appointed, in conjunction with others, minister-plenipotentiary to negotiate a treaty of peace with Great Britain,—viz., in June, 1781, and in November, 1782,—but was prevented, by circumstances beyond his control, from action in either instance. Returned to Congress in 1783, he reported to that body, from a committee of which he was chairman, the definitive treaty of peace, (concluded at Paris, September 3, 1783,) acknowledging the independence which had been announced in the Declaration of July 4, 1776. He also proposed, and carried through Congress at its next session, a bill establishing the present Federal system of coinage, which took the place of the English pounds, shillings, pence, etc., and reported a plan of government for the territory of the United States. In May following, (1784,) Congress appointed him minister-plenipotentiary to act with Franklin and Adams in negotiating treaties of commerce and amity with foreign powers; and in 1785 he succeeded Dr. Franklin as resident minister at Paris. It was during this sojourn in France, which was one of the happiest periods of Jefferson's life, that he formed that strong predilection for the French nation over the English which marked so conspicuously his subsequent career. He published, while abroad, his famous "Notes on Virginia," relating to politics, commerce, manufactures, etc., (Paris, 1784,) which at once attracted general attention throughout Europe. Having obtained permission to return to America, he left Paris in September, 1789, and reached Virginia soon after the election of Washington as first President of the United States. The Federal Constitution, then recently adopted, did not meet with his approval. He declared that he did not know whether the good or the bad predominated. Subsequently, however, he thought more favourably of it. In organizing the government, Washington offered him a seat in his cabinet as secretary of state, which Jefferson accepted.

With Washington's administration began the fierce struggles between the two great political parties of the country, the Republicans and Federalists,—the former under the lead of Jefferson, and the latter under that of Alexander Hamilton, then secretary of the treasury. Jefferson opposed Hamilton's funding system, his United States bank, and other financial measures; and when the war broke out between England and France he was in favour of aiding the latter with our arms, while Hamilton advocated the observance of a strict neutrality. These differences between the two rival chiefs, which were the occasion of many stormy discussions in the cabinet and of an almost unexampled political excitement throughout the country, culminated shortly after the dismissal of the French minister Genest, (Genet,) and Jefferson resigned his office, December 31, 1793, and retired to Monticello. At the close of Washington's second term he was again called into public life, as the Presidential candidate of the Republican party, John Adams being the nominee of the Federalists. In the ensuing election Adams received the highest number of votes, and was declared President; and, according to a rule then in force, Jefferson, being the next highest candidate, became Vice-President. By virtue of this office he took his seat, March 4, 1797, as president of the Senate. The disputes with France, and other difficult questions, rendered the administration one of extraordinary turbulence. At its close, Jefferson and Adams were again the respective candidates of the Republican and Federal parties. In this election the Republicans triumphed, but cast an equal number of votes for Jefferson and Aaron Burr,—seventy-three: Adams received but sixty-five. As it was necessary that the person chosen to the first office should have a plurality of votes, the election, in these circumstances, devolved upon the House of Representatives, which, on its thirty-sixth ballot, declared Jefferson President and Burr Vice-President, their terms of office to commence March 4, 1801. Jefferson was re-elected in 1804 by an electoral vote of one hundred and forty-eight to twenty-eight, and in 1809 retired voluntarily from office, after a prosperous administration of eight years. Among the important events that occurred during his term of office were the purchase of Louisiana, (1803,) the brilliant victories of our fleets in the Mediterranean, and peace with Morocco and Tripoli, in 1803, Lewis and Clark's overland exploring expedition to the Pacific, sent out by the President in 1804, the arrest and trial of Aaron Burr for treason, 1807, and the attack, the same year, of the British war-frigate Leopard on the American frigate Chesapeake, which led to Jefferson's embargo act and ultimately to the second war with Great Britain. Washington and Adams had opened Congress with a speech; but Jefferson preferred a written message, as being more democratic. He also initiated the policy of removing incumbents from office on the grounds of a difference in political opinion. After participating in the inauguration of his friend and successor, James Madison, Jefferson retired to Monticello, where he passed the remainder of his life in attending to his private affairs, receiving the numerous calls of friends and strangers, and in the exercise of a most liberal hospitality. In 1819 he took the chief part in founding the University of Virginia, at Charlottesville, near Monticello, and acted as its rector till his death, which occurred on the same day with that of John Adams, July 4, 1826,—the fiftieth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence. The following epitaph, written by himself, is inscribed on his tombstone, a small granite obelisk, at Monticello: "Here was buried Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, of the Statute of Virginia for Religious Freedom, and Father of the University of Virginia." As the author of the Declaration of Independence and the founder of the Republican (Democratic) party, Jefferson has probably exerted a greater influence on the institutions of this country than any other American except Washington. He was regarded as the very embodiment of democracy. All titles of honour —even that of Mr.—were distasteful to him. Dressed in the plainest apparel, he was as accessible to the yeoman in his every-day garments as to a foreign dignitary of state. In his intercourse with others he was distinguished for his affability. His conversation was fluent, imaginative, various, and eloquent. "In Europe," wrote the Duc de Liancourt, "he would hold a distinguished rank among men of letters." His adroitness in politics and in the management of men has rarely been surpassed. In religion he was what is denominated a free-thinker. "His instincts," says Bancroft, "all inclined him to trace every fact to a general law, and to put faith in ideal truth." Slavery he considered a moral and political evil, and declared in reference to it that he "trembled for his country when he remembered that God is just." His extreme views of State rights in later life were very much modified, and he owned that it was necessary for the general government sometimes "to show its teeth."

In his prime, Jefferson was six feet two and a half inches in height, with a sinewy, well-developed frame angular face, but amiable countenance, and ruddy complexion delicately fair. He had deep-set, light-hazel eyes, and hair of a reddish chestnut colour, very fine. He was married in 1772 to Mrs. Martha Skelton, daughter of John Wales, a distinguished Virginia lawyer. She brought him a large dowry in lands and slaves, about equal in value to his own property; but his liberality and generous living left him insolvent at his death. One daughter and ten grandchildren survived him. "The Memoirs, Correspondence, and Private Papers of Thomas Jefferson," in 4 vols. 8vo, edited by his grandson, Thomas Jefferson Randolph, was published at Charlottesville in 1829, and republished in London and Boston the same year, and in New York in 1830. In 1848 his manuscripts were purchased by Congress, and published under the title of "The Writings of Thomas Jefferson," in 9 vols. 8vo, 1853–55. His "Manual of Parliamentary Practice" is still in use among legislative bodies in this country.

Jef'ferў or Jef'frey, (JOHN,) an English divine, born at Ipswich in 1647. He was chosen rector of Kirton and Falkenham, in Suffolk, in 1687, and was appointed Archdeacon of Norwich in 1694. He published the religious works of Sir Thomas Browne. Dr. Jeffrey was strongly opposed to religious controversy. Died in 1720.

See "Life of Jeffery," prefixed to his "Sermons."

Jeffery or Jeffrey, (THOMAS,) an English dissenting minister, born at Exeter about the year 1700. He was the author of several religious works, in which he displayed great ability. Of these we may mention "The True Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion," and "The Divinity of Christ proved from Holy Scripture." Died about 1728.

Jef'frey, (FRANCIS,) LORD, a distinguished Scottish critic and essayist, born in Edinburgh on the 23d of October, 1773. He was sent to the University of Glasgow in 1787, and removed in 1791 to Queen's College, Oxford, where he remained but a few months. In 1794 he was admitted an advocate to the Scottish bar, but for several years obtained scarcely any practice. About this time he became a member of the Speculative Society of Edinburgh, where he formed the acquaintance of several young men afterwards eminent in the literary and political world. Among these were Sydney Smith and Henry (afterwards Lord) Brougham, with whom he projected the "Edinburgh Review," the first number of which was issued in October, 1802. Three numbers were edited by Smith; but upon his removal to London the entire charge devolved upon Jeffrey, who held the position of editor for the ensuing twenty-six years. It was successful from the first, and in a short time the circulation had increased to about nine thousand, and in 1813 it considerably exceeded twelve thousand. As Jeffrey himself expressed it, "it stood on two legs, the one being the criticism of current literature, the other being Whig politics." The commencement of the "Edinburgh Review" formed a new era in English literature, and completely changed the style of the popular magazines. Jeffrey was the principal contributor; and his articles in both politics and criticism attracted great attention. Scott, Byron, Coleridge, Wordsworth, Moore, and other distinguished poets of that period were severely—sometimes unjustly—criticised; but most of them afterwards became warm friends of the great reviewer. About 1802 he married his second-cousin, Catherine Wilson, who died in 1805. In 1813 he married an American lady in New York, named Charlotte Wilkes. Though Jeffrey devoted so much of his time to editorial labours, his practice as a lawyer greatly increased. In rapidity, fluency, and eloquence he had no equal at the Scottish bar. Once, while conducting the prosecution of a libel-suit at Glasgow, he poured forth such a torrent of words that the opposing counsel declared "that, by calculation with his watch, that man had actually spoken the English language twice over in three hours." In 1820 he was elected lord rector of the University of Glasgow. Nine years later he became dean of the faculty of advocates, and thereupon resigned the editorial chair of the "Edinburgh Review." In 1830 he was elected to the first Parliament of William IV. He continued in Parliament four years, and held the office of lord advocate of Scotland under the administration of Grey. He received the appointment to a Scottish judgeship in 1834, with the honorary title of Lord. As a judge he was highly esteemed for his conscientiousness and his business qualifications. Lord Jeffrey's contributions to the "Edinburgh Review" extend over a period of nearly fifty years, and amount to over three hundred articles. The greater part of these were published, in 4 vols., in 1843. Died in January, 1850.

See LORD COCKBURN, "Life of Lord Jeffrey," 2 vols., 1852; ALLIBONE, "Dictionary of Authors;" "Quarterly Review" for July, 1852; "Blackwood's Magazine" for September and October, 1852; "Fraser's Magazine" for May, 1852; "North British Review" for May, 1850, and August, 1852. For an able, though somewhat severe, review of Jeffrey's character as a critic, see article entitled "British Critics," published in the second volume of WHIPPLE'S "Essays and Reviews," New York, 1849: (it first appeared in the "North American Review" for October, 1845.)

Jef'frey, (ROSA VERTNER,) an American novelist, born at Natchez, Mississippi, in 1828. Her maiden name was GRIFFITH, the name Vertner being that of an aunt who adopted her. When seventeen years old, she married a Mr. Johnson, of Lexington, Kentucky, and after his death married Mr. Alexander Jeffrey. Among her works are "Poems," (1857,) "Daisy Dare," etc., (1871,) "Crimson Hand, and other Poems," (1881,) and the novels "Woodburn" (1863) and "Marah," (1884.)

Jef'freyş, (Lord GEORGE,) Baron Wem, the infamous minion of James II., was born at Acton, in Denbighshire, and studied law at the Middle Temple. At first he professed to be a Roundhead, and was chosen recorder of London, and city judge. During his practice at the Old Bailey bar he had acquired a boundless command of the language in which the depraved express hatred and contempt; and on the bench he hesitated not to pour forth torrents of oaths, curses, and vituperative epithets on attorneys, jurymen, witnesses, and prisoners. Age and merit were treated in the same manner; for when Baxter was brought before him, on a charge of nonconformity, he railed in such a manner at that eminent divine and his counsel that it was impossible to obtain a fair trial. His voice and manners were always disagreeable; but these, which he considered natural advantages, he had improved to such a degree that in his paroxysms of rage few could hear him unmoved. His eye had a terrible fascination for the prisoner on whom it was fixed. He appeared to delight in misery merely for its own sake. Such was the man who became the court favourite of James and chief justice of England. Jeffreys, perceiving that he had obtained all that could be expected from his old friends, sought the favour of the court. He received great attention from the Duke of York; but the king regarded him with contempt and disgust. Notwithstanding these views, however, Jeffreys was soon made chief justice of the king's bench. Upon James's accession to the throne he was raised to the peerage, with the title of Baron Wem, and was subsequently made lord high chancellor of England. He gained great notoriety during the trials of those who had participated in the rebellion of the Duke of Monmouth. Pen can scarcely portray the atrocities committed under his jurisdiction. He delighted in torturing, burning, hanging, and beheading men, women, and children, after the merest shams of trials. All these actions appeared to give great satisfaction to his sovereign. Yet his decisions are said to have been generally just and impartial where political purposes were not to be subserved. When the Prince of Orange came to England, the lord chancellor attempted to escape to the continent; but as he was in a beer-house at Wapping, dressed as a sailor, he was discovered by an attorney whom he had formerly abused. This person gave the information to the populace, who immediately seized Jeffreys and carried him before the mayor, from whence he was sent to the Lords. By them he was committed to the Tower, where he died in 1689, from the effects of his intemperance and misfortunes.

Jeffreys, (GEORGE,) an English poet, born in Northamptonshire in 1678. He studied at Cambridge, and was admitted to the bar, but never practised. Among his productions were several tragedies, and an oratorio, entitled "The Triumph of Truth." Died in 1755.

See BAKER, "Biographia Dramatica."

Jef'freys, (JOHN GWYN,) a Welsh naturalist, born at Swansea, January 18, 1809. He became a solicitor, and in 1856 was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, but retired from the profession in 1866. His principal work is "British Conchology," (5 vols., 1862–69.) Died in 1885.

Jeffries, jef'frĕz, (JOHN,) M.D., an American physician, born in Boston in 1744. He graduated at Harvard in 1763, and took his medical degree at Edinburgh. In the Revolution he sided with the British, and became surgeon-major to the royal army in America. In 1780 he resumed his profession in London. While making some investigations in atmospheric temperature, in 1785, he crossed from England to France in a balloon. This was the first successful experiment in aeronautics on an extensive scale. He returned to Boston in 1789, and died in 1819.

Jehân-Geer or Jahângir, jẹ-hăn'gēer', written also Djahanguir, Djehanguire, Djahan Ghyr, and Dschehangir, (i.e. the "Conqueror of the World,") one of the Mogul emperors of Hindostan, succeeded his father, the great Akbăr, in 1605. Jehangeer left Memoirs of his own life. He died in 1627. He inherited nothing of the ability of his father. It was during the reign of this emperor that the celebrated embassy of Sir Thomas Roe arrived from England at the court of Delhi.

Jek'yll, (Sir JOSEPH,) a distinguished lawyer and statesman, born in Nottinghamshire in 1664. He was a prominent member of the Whig party during the reign of Queen Anne, and was knighted upon the accession of George I. He was afterwards master of the rolls, and privy councillor. Died in 1738.

Jekyll, (JOSEPH,) M.P., a witty English barrister, born about 1752, was distinguished by his talent for epigram and repartee. He became solicitor-general to the Prince of Wales in 1805. Died in 1837.

Jelâl-ed-Deen or Djelal-Eddin, jẹh-lâl' ed-deen', (i.e. the "Splendour (or Glory) of Religion,") written also Jalal-ed-Deen and Djalal-Eddin, King of Khorasmia, who succeeded his father, Ala-ed-Deen, in 1218, was renowned for his military ability and enterprise. He fought numerous battles against Jengis Khan with various success. It is said that he afterwards abandoned himself to indolence and pleasure, and when a Mongol army invaded his capital he fled, and was killed, in 1231.

Jelâl-ed-Deen-Roomee, (Jelâl-ed-Dîn-Rûmî or Djelal-ed-dyn-Roumy,) jẹh-lâl' ed-deen-roo'mee, one of the most eminent Persian poets, born at Bŭlkh or Balkh, in Khorassân, about 1200. His father was a noted doctor and preacher of the Soofee sect, who settled at Iconium, (Konieh,) in Asia Minor, (called in Arabic and Persian Room, because it was part of the empire of Rome.) At his death, in 1233, Jelâl-ed-Deen became the chief of the Soofees. His "Mes'newee" ("Mesnewi") or "Mesnevee," (i.e. poem with rhyming couplets,) less correctly written "Metsnewee" or "Metsnevi," is regarded as an excellent model of the mystical style. "This precious pearl of the ocean of mysticism departed from this fragile world" in 1272.

Jelf, (RICHARD WILLIAM,) D.D., an English clergyman and author, born in London in 1798. He graduated in 1820 at Oxford, and became a Fellow of Oriel and a tutor, was made canon of Christ Church in 1831, was Bampton lecturer in 1834, and in that year became principal of King's College, London. He wrote several theological works. Died at Oxford, September 19, 1871.

Jelf, (WILLIAM EDWARD,) D.D., a brother of the preceding, was born in Gloucester in 1811. He was educated at Eton, and at Christ Church, Oxford, graduating in 1833. His "Greek Grammar" (1842–45) added greatly to his fame. He also edited the "Ethics" of Aristotle. Died October 18, 1875.

Jellachich von Buzim, von, fon yel'lâ-KIK' fon bōōt'sĭm, (FRANZ,) BARON, an Austrian general, born in 1746, fought with distinction in the principal campaigns of the French Revolution, and rose to be lieutenant-field-marshal in 1800. Died in 1810.

Jellachich von Buzim, von, (JOSEPH,) Ban of Croatia, son of the preceding, was born at Peterwardein in 1801. In the revolution of 1848 he was appointed Ban, or commander-in-chief, of the Croats, and had the principal share in the victory of Schwechat, near Vienna, over the Hungarians. He gained several advantages over General Bem, but was at length defeated, (1849,) and forced to retreat with considerable loss. Died in 1859.

Jengis Khan, jĕn'gis kân, (written also Djenguiz Khan, Dschengis Chan, Tchenguyz Khan, Chingis Khan, and in various other modes,*) a celebrated Tartar conqueror, born in 1164, was the son of a Mongolian chief. Having subdued a number of Mongol and Tartar tribes, he caused himself to be proclaimed khan of the nation, and about 1210 invaded China, took Peking, (1215,) and in a few years gained possession of the northern provinces. In 1218 he marched against Mohammed Koteb-ed-Deen, King of Khorasmia, whom he defeated, and afterwards destroyed Bokhara, Samarcand, and other cities. Having subjected the whole of Persia, he gained a victory over the King of Tangoot, and was proceeding towards the south of China, when he died in 1227, leaving the principal part of his empire to his son Oktai. Jengis Khan is said to have caused the destruction of five millions of human beings. He gave a code of laws, which is still called by his name.

Jĕn'ner, (EDWARD,) M.D., celebrated for having introduced the practice of vaccination, was born at Berkeley, in Gloucestershire, England, in 1749. He studied surgery at Sodbury, and afterwards went to London, where he attended the lectures of the celebrated John Hunter, with whom he formed an intimate friendship. He commenced practice at Berkeley, and obtained a high reputation for skill. His attention was first called to the subject of vaccination by hearing a countrywoman remark that she could not take the smallpox, because she had had the cow-pox. Upon investigating the subject, he ascertained that milkers frequently caught a disease from an eruption on the cow's udder, and that to such persons it was impossible to communicate the smallpox by inoculation. Jenner related the circumstance to several eminent men in the profession; but they treated it with ridicule. By further experiments he clearly demonstrated the fact that from one of the several eruptions to which cows were subject, the true cow-pox, as he termed it, could be propagated to the human body, and then from one person to another, and that this was a preventive of the smallpox. After nearly twenty years of experiments, he published "An Enquiry into the Causes and Effects of the Variolæ Vaccinæ," (1798;) and soon after more than seventy physicians and surgeons signed a declaration of their entire confidence in the truth of Jenner's theory. He was rewarded by Parliament for his discovery by a present of £10,000 in 1802, and a grant of £20,000 in 1807. He also received marks of distinction from the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia. Died in 1823.

Jereer, Jerîr, or Djerir, jĕh-reeR', [in German, DSCHERIR,] or, more fully, Jereer-Ibn-Ateeyah-Attemeemee, (Attemîmî,) Ib'n ă'tee'yah ăt-tẹ-mee'mee, surnamed ABOO- (ABÛ-) HAZRAH, (ă'bōō hăz'rā,) a celebrated Arabian poet, who lived at Bassora, (Basra,) whence he was called EL-BASREE, (or -BASRY.) He excelled in almost every kind of poetry, in panegyric, and in amatory pieces, but was most distinguished for his wit and satiric powers. He died about 730 (or, according to some authorities, about 700) A.D.

Jĕr-ẹ-mī'ah, [Heb. יִרְמְיָה or יִרְמְיָהוּ; Lat. JEREMI'AS; Fr. JÉRÉMIE, zhā'rā'me'; Ger. JEREMIAS, yā-rā-mee'ās; It. GEREMIA, jā-rā-mee'ā,] a prophet of Judah, who lived about 600 B.C., was one of the four great prophets of the Bible. He was the author of the greater part of the book in the Old Testament which bears his name, and of all the book of Lamentations. He is called JEREMY in the New Testament. (Matthew xxvii. 9.) Died about 580 B.C.

Jeremiah was Patriarch of Constantinople in 1572. The Lutherans sent him a copy of the Confession of Augsburg, hoping to obtain his approval of it; but, on the contrary, he condemned it in many of his writings.

Jeremie, jĕr'ẹ-me, (Sir JOHN,) an eloquent lawyer, born in Guernsey in 1795, at the age of twenty was admitted to the bar. In 1824 he was appointed chief justice of Saint Lucia, in the West Indies. When he first went to that island he was opposed to the abolitionists; but, improving the opportunities which he possessed of investigating the subject of slavery, he formed very different views. During the time that he held office in Saint Lucia he ably enforced the laws for the amelioration of the condition of the slaves. On his return to England, in 1831, he published "Four Essays on Colonial Slavery." In 1836 he became justice of the supreme court of Ceylon, and four years later Governor and Captain-General of Sierra Leone, where he died in 1841. He was the author of a "Letter on Negro Emancipation and African Civilization."

Jerichau, yĕR'ị̄-kŏw, (JENS ADOLF,) a Danish sculptor of distinction, was born at Arsens, April 17, 1816; died at Copenhagen, July 25, 1883. His wife, ELIZABETH JERICHAU-BAUMANN, was born at Warsaw, November 19, 1819, and died at Copenhagen, July 11, 1881. She had a good reputation as a painter.

Jerome, je-rōm' or jẽr'ọm, [Lat. HIERON'YMUS; Fr. JÉRÔME, zhā'rōm'; Ger. HIEROM, hee'rom; It. GIROLAMO, je-rol'ā-mo; Sp. GERONIMO, hā-ron'e-mo,] SAINT, or, more fully, Eu-se'bĭ-us Hi-er-on'ў-mus So-phro'nĭ-us, one of the most learned of the Latin Fathers of the Church, was born at Stridon, in Dalmatia or in Pannonia, about 340 A.D. After receiving his education at Rome, he visited Gaul, where he collected a valuable library. He next travelled through Thrace, Pontus, and Cappadocia, and finally fixed his residence in Syria. He subsequently went to Jerusalem to study Hebrew. About 382 he returned to Rome, and became secretary to Pope Damasus. Upon the death of that pontiff he removed to a monastery at Bethlehem, where he died in 420 A.D. A large portion of his writings were of a controversial character, exhibiting great learning, eloquence, and ingenuity, though too often betraying bigotry, passion, and bitterness. But the works by which he will ever be remembered and honoured are a treatise on the "Lives and Writings of the Elder Christian Fathers," "Commentaries on the Prophetical Books of the Old Testament, the Gospel of Saint Matthew, and several of the Epistles of Saint Paul," and a translation of the Old and New Testaments into Latin, known in the Romish Church as the "Vulgate."

Jerome of Prague, [Lat. HIERON'YMUS PRAGEN'SIS,] one of the most distinguished followers of John Huss, was born in the city from which he took his surname. He studied at the Universities of Paris, Heidelberg, and Cologne, each of which conferred upon him the diploma of D.D. About 1400 he became acquainted with John Huss, whose doctrines he soon after began to preach with great effect in Bohemia, Hungary, and Poland. In 1415, when Huss was arrested, Jerome prepared to go to Constance to defend him. Being informed, however, of the great hostility felt there towards reputed heretics, he retired to Eberlingen, and afterwards attempted to return to Bohemia, but was arrested, and placed in the custody of the Prince of Salzburg, who sent him in chains to Constance, where he was thrown into prison and treated with great cruelty. On a third examination before the council, he signed a recantation of the doctrines of Huss in regard to transubstantiation; but a few months after he bitterly repented of this, and declared that fear of a cruel death alone induced him to do it. He was thereupon condemned as a heretic, and sentenced to be burnt on the 30th of May, 1416. He suffered with the greatest firmness, serenity, and Christian heroism, and his death excited the highest admiration even in his enemies.

Jĕr'rold, (DOUGLAS WILLIAM,) celebrated as a humourist, a journalist, and a dramatical and satirical writer, was born in London in 1803. He was the son of the manager of Sheerness Theatre, where he imbibed his taste for dramatic literature. He was apprenticed to a printer in London, in which situation he diligently improved his leisure hours in the study of literature and the languages. Shakspeare was his favourite book. His first production was an essay on the opera of "Der Freischütz," which he enclosed anonymously to the editor by whom he was then employed. The article was highly commended, and Jerrold had the satisfaction of placing it in type. Thus encouraged, he wrote "Black-Eyed Susan," (about 1824,) one of the most popular dramas ever acted on the English stage. This was followed by several other plays of great merit. He afterwards became a contributor to "Punch," the popularity of which was rapidly increased by his satirical and witty productions. He also edited successively "The Heads of the People," "The Illuminated Magazine," "The Shilling Magazine," and "Lloyd's Weekly." All of these were very successful, and the last had an immense circulation. Many of his writings have been issued in volume form, among which we may mention "Mrs. Caudle's Curtain Lectures," (new edition, 1846,) "Chronicles of Clovernook," (1846,) "Saint Giles and Saint James," (1851,) "Prisoner of War," "Time Works Wonders," (1854,) and the "Bubbles of the Day." Died in 1857.

Jerrold, (WILLIAM BLANCHARD,) a son of the preceding, was born in London in 1826. He published, besides other works, "A Brage-Beaker with the Swedes, or Notes from the North," (1853,) "Life of Douglas Jerrold," (1859,) "Chronicles of a Crutch," (1860,) "Two Lives," (1865,) "Up and Down in the World," (1866,) "The Children of Lutetia," "The Gavroche Party," (1870,) "London, a Pilgrimage," (1872,) "Life of Napoleon III.," (1874,) etc. He succeeded his father as editor of "Lloyd's Weekly News." Died March 10, 1884.

Jerusalem, yà-roo'zâ-lĕm', (JOHANN FRIEDRICH WILHELM,) a celebrated Protestant divine and pulpit orator, born at Osnabrück, in Germany, in 1709. He was appointed in 1740 court preacher to Duke Charles of Brunswick, and soon after became tutor to his son, Prince Charles William. Through his influence the Caroline College was established at Brunswick. In 1771 he was created vice-president of the consistory at Wolfenbüttel. He published, besides sermons, "Contemplations on the Principal Truths of Religion," (5 vols., 1768–79.) Died in 1789. The suicide of his son, Karl Wilhelm, suggested to Goethe the story of "Werther."

Jẹr'vas, (CHARLES,) a portrait-painter, and native of Ireland, born about 1675. His chief excellence lay in copying. He gave lessons to Pope the poet, who highly praises him in the "Epistle to Jervas." Died in 1739.

See WALPOLE, "Anecdotes of Painting."

Jẹr'vis, (JOHN,) Earl of Saint Vincent, and admiral of the British fleet, born at Meaford, in Staffordshire, in 1734. He entered the navy when ten years old, and in 1760 became a post-captain. In 1778 he commanded an eighty-gun ship in Keppel's action against the French, and in 1782 captured the Pégase, of seventy-four guns. He sat in Parliament several years for various boroughs, until the commencement of the French Revolution, when he sailed at the head of a squadron to the West Indies, with the rank of rear-admiral. He captured Martinique, Guadeloupe, and Saint Lucia. In 1795 he was made admiral of the blue, and commander of the naval force in the Mediterranean. He encountered the Spanish fleet off Cape Saint Vincent in February, 1797, and, though their force was double his own, he gained a complete victory. For this exploit he received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament, and a pension of £3000, and was raised to the peerage, with the titles of Earl of Saint Vincent and Baron Jervis of Meaford. He was appointed first lord of the admiralty in 1801, and retired from that office in 1804. He became admiral of the fleet in 1821. Died in 1823.

Jevhery or Djévhéry, jĕv'hȧ-ree, (Ismaeel-Ibn-Ham'mad,) an Arabian lexicographer, born at Farab. After travelling through various countries, he settled at Nishapoor, in Persia, where, in 999, he published one of the most perfect of Arabian dictionaries, of which Golius made extensive use in his "Lexicon Arabicum." Died about 1005.

Jev'ǫn, (THOMAS,) an English dramatic writer and actor, who died in 1688, aged about thirty-five.

Jev'ǫnš, (WILLIAM STANLEY,) an English economist and author, born at Liverpool, September 1, 1835. He was a grandson of William Roscoe, the historian. He was educated at University College, London, and graduated in 1862 as M.A., after having spent five years as an officer of the mint at Sydney, Australia. He was, 1866–76, professor of logic and mental and moral philosophy at Owens College, Manchester, and in 1875 became professor of political economy in University College, London. Among his works are "Pure Logic," (1864,) "The Coal Question," (1865,) "Elementary Lessons in Logic," (1870,) "Theory of Political Economy," (1871,) "Logic Primer," (1876,) "Political Economy Primer," "Studies in Deductive Logic," (1880.) He was drowned, August 13, 1882.

Jew'ęll or Jew'ęl, (JOHN,) Bishop of Salisbury, one of the earliest champions of the Episcopal Church, born at Buden, in Devonshire, in 1522. He studied at Oxford, and graduated in 1540. Under the reign of Edward VI. he openly avowed the Protestant faith, and assisted Peter Martyr in his dispute with the Catholic theologians at Oxford. After the accession of Mary he fled to Germany, (1555,) and at Strasburg again met Martyr, whom he assisted on some of his works. When Elizabeth ascended the throne, Jewell returned to England, and was ordained Bishop of Salisbury in 1559 or 1560. In this position he continued to labour diligently for the advancement of the Protestant religion. He died in 1571, greatly esteemed for his eminent piety and vast theological knowledge. His writings are principally of a controversial nature, and are still highly valued. The most important of these is "Apologia Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ," ("Apology for the Church of England," 1562,) written in elegant Latin, and translated into English by the mother of Lord Bacon. Versions were also rendered of it into Dutch, French, German, Greek, Italian, and Spanish; and it is said to have done more for the promotion of the Reformation than any other work. Jewell also wrote a "Defence of the Apology," (1567,) in answer to Harding, a Roman Catholic, who had attacked him.

Jew'ętt, (SARAH ORNE,) an American author, born at South Berwick, Maine, September 3, 1849. She wrote "Deephaven," (1877,) "Play-Days," (1878,) "Old Friends and New," (1879,) "Country Byways," (1880,) "The Mate of the Daylight," (1882,) and other novels.

Jew'itt, (LLEWELLYN,) an English author, born at Kimberworth, November 24, 1816. Among his publications are "The Ceramic Art of Great Britain," (2 vols., 2000 engravings,) "The Stately Homes of England," (partly by S. C. Hall,) "Mountain, River, Lake, and Landscape Scenery of Great Britain," (4 vols. folio,) "The Wedgwoods," "Life of William Hutton," "History of Plymouth," "Hand-Book of English Coins," "History of the County of Derby," etc. Died in 1886.

Jewš'bur-ў, (GERALDINE ENDSOR,) younger sister of Mrs. Fletcher, noticed below, was born at Manchester in 1821. She published a number of novels, among which may be named "Zoe, or the History of Two Lives," (1845,) "Marian Withers," (1851,) and "The Sorrows of Gentility," (1856.) Died Sept. 22, 1880.

Jewsbury, (MARIA JANE,) an English authoress, born in Warwickshire about 1800. Among her principal works are "Phantasmagoria, or Sketches of Life and Literature," (1825,) "Lays of Leisure Hours," (1829,) and "Three Histories." Having been married in 1832 or 1833 to the Rev. William Fletcher, she accompanied him to India, where she died in 1833. She was an intimate friend of Wordsworth, who has eulogized her character and talents. He said he considered her "unrivalled in one quality,—quickness in the motions of her mind."

Jex-Blake, (THOMAS WILLIAM,) D.D., an English educator, born in London, January 26, 1832. He was educated at Rugby, and at University College, Oxford, graduating in 1855. He became a Fellow of Queen's College, was made principal of Cheltenham College in 1868, and head-master of Rugby in 1874. Among his works are "Long Vacation in Continental Picture-Galleries," (1858,) "Life by Faith," (1875,) etc.

Jĕz'ę-bĕl, [Heb. אִיזֶבֶל; Fr. JÉSABEL, zhȧ'zȧ'bĕl',] a daughter of Ethbaal, King of the Zidonians, and wife of Ahab, King of Israel. She was notorious for her cruelty and ill faith. She was killed by being thrown out of a window by the order of Jehu.

Jezid or Jezed. See YEZEED.

Jezzar or Djezzar Ahmed, jĕz'zȧr ȧH'mĕd, a Pasha of Acre and Sidon, notorious for his cruelty, was born in Bosnia. After being a slave of Ali Bey in Egypt, he became governor of Cairo. In 1775 he was appointed Pasha of Acre and Sidon, and about 1784 he received the Three Tails. In 1799 he was defeated by the French, and shut himself in Saint-Jean-d'Acre, which, with the aid of Sir Sidney Smith, he successfully defended against Bonaparte. Died in 1804.

Jhering, von, fon yā'rĭng, (RUDOLF,) an able German jurist, born at Aurich, in East Friesland, August 22, 1818. He was educated at Heidelberg, Munich, and Göttingen. He held professorships of Roman law successively at Basle, Rostock, Kiel, Giessen, Vienna, and Göttingen. He published the celebrated "Spirit of the Roman Law," (3 vols., 1852–65.) One of his popular works, "The Struggle about Law," ("Der Kampf ums Recht," 1872,) has been translated nineteen times into foreign languages.

Jĭnă, jin'ą, [a Sanscrit word signifying "victorious,"] one of the many names applied to Vishnu: also the name of a celebrated sage, (called also JAINA, jī'ną,) the founder of the sect of Jains or Jainas. It is also the title of each of the saints who have been deified by the Jains. As the Hindoos have no trustworthy annals, it seems impossible to determine positively the historical character of the Jains. They are commonly regarded as a division or offshoot of the Booddhists. Thus much is certain, that in some of their tenets and customs the Jains closely resemble the Booddhists. They have a peculiar sacred language (not now in use) called the "Jaina Prakrit."

See MOOR, "Hindu Pantheon," and an excellent article on the Jains, by MR. RHYS DAVIDS, in the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

Jirecek, yee'ret-chek, (HERMENEGILD,) a Bohemian (Czech) jurist, brother of Joseph Jirecek, was born at Hohenmauth, April 13, 1827. His principal works are on Bohemian and Moravian law.

Jirecek, (JOSEPH,) a Bohemian (Czech) historian, born at Hohenmauth, October 9, 1825. He became connected with the Austrian departments of public instruction and worship, and did much to develop the recent renaissance of Slavic literature throughout Austria-Hungary. His writings have special reference to the literary history of the Slavs of Austria. Died in 1888.

Jirecek, (KONSTANTIN JOSEPH,) a son of Joseph Jirecek, was born at Vienna, July 24, 1854, and became general secretary of the Bulgarian ministry of public instruction. He published a "Bibliography of Bulgarian Literature," (1872,) a "History of the Bulgarians," (1876,) and valuable works on the resources and trade of the Balkan peninsula. In 1884 he was appointed professor of history at Prague.

Jōan or Jo-an'na [Fr. JEANNE, zhăn; It. GIOVANNA, jo-vån'nå] I., Queen of Naples, a daughter of Charles, Duke of Calabria, was born in 1327. She was married to Andrew, Prince of Hungary, and in 1343 succeeded her grandfather, Robert, King of Naples. In 1345 Andrew was murdered by conspirators, probably with the connivance of Joan, who soon after married Prince Louis of Tarentum. To avenge the death of Andrew, Louis, King of Hungary, invaded Naples and expelled Joan from the kingdom. Having gained the favour of the pope by ceding Avignon to him, she was restored to the throne in 1352. She was married in 1376 to her fourth husband, Otho of Brunswick, but continued to be childless. In 1381 Naples was invaded by Charles Durazzo, who captured Joan and put her to death in 1382.

See "Historical Life of Joanna of Sicily," London, 2 vols., 1824; GIANNONE, "Storia civile del Regno di Napoli;" V. MIGNOT, "Histoire de Jeanne I, Reine de Naples," 1764; D. CRIVELLI, "Della prima e della seconda Giovanna, Regine di Napoli," 1832; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale," (under "Jeanne.")

Joan (or Giovanna) II., daughter of the Duke of Durazzo, succeeded her brother Ladislaus on the throne of Naples in 1414. She was notorious for her licentious conduct and the number of her favourites. She died in 1435, leaving the kingdom in a very unsettled state.

See D. CRIVELLI, "Della prima e della seconda Giovanna, Regine di Napoli," 1832; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Joan, POPE, supposed by most authorities to be a fabulous character, is placed by several writers in the ninth century. Having assumed male attire, she went to Rome, and became so celebrated for her ecclesiastical knowledge that upon the death of Leo IV. she was unanimously elected pope. She was, however, one day seized with the pains of childbirth as she was proceeding to the Lateran Basilica, and died in the street, after a pontificate of two years, five months, and four days. She was buried without honours. Other accounts state that upon the discovery of the imposture she was stoned to death by the populace. David Blondel, a Protestant historian, was the first to show this story to be a fiction, although it was in circulation as early as the thirteenth century.

See J. LENFANT, "Histoire de la Papesse Jeanne," 1730; S. BARING-GOULD, "Curious Myths of the Middle Ages," 1867; DÖLLINGER, "Papst-Fabeln," 1863.

Joan, Queen of Castile, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella the Catholic, was married in 1496 to Philip, Archduke of Austria. In 1500 she gave birth to Prince Carlos, afterwards Charles V. of Germany. She soon after lost her reason; and when, upon the death of Isabella, she became Queen of Castile, it was necessary that a regent should be appointed. Died in 1555.

See PRESCOTT, "History of Ferdinand and Isabella;" MARIANA, "Historia de España."

Joan, (Jeanne,) daughter and heiress of Henry I. of Navarre, and queen of Philippe le Bel of France, was born in 1272. Upon her marriage with the French monarch she retained authority over her hereditary dominions of Navarre and Champagne. She carried on a successful war against the Castilians and Aragonese, assisted her husband in the councils and administration of affairs in France, established a college in Navarre, and was a liberal patroness of learning. In 1297, Count de Bar having invaded Champagne, the queen marched against him at the head of her troops, cut his army in pieces, and carried him prisoner to Paris. Died in 1305.

Jōan of Arc, or Jeanne Darc, zhăn dårk, surnamed THE MAID OF ORLEANS, [Fr. LA PUCELLE D'ORLÉANS, là pü'sêl' dor'là'ôN',] the most illustrious of the heroines of history, was born in the hamlet of Dom-Remy, in Lorraine, about 1411. She was the daughter of poor and religious peasants, who implanted in her heart at an early age the seeds of that exalted enthusiasm which subsequently obtained so absolute an ascendency over her character. At this time the rival factions of the Orléanists or Armagnacs and the Burgundians desolated France by their wars. The former supported the claims of Charles VII.; while the latter had sworn allegiance to Henry V. of England. Joan from infancy had imbibed the principles of the Orléanists, by whom she was surrounded. Her devotion to their cause was increased by the cruelties which she frequently saw the enemy commit. She was untiring in her efforts to relieve the sufferings of the poor around her, and even sold her bed and the greater part of her clothing in order to procure them supplies. She afterwards stated that as early as the age of thirteen she received commands from Heaven to go and liberate France. These commands continued to be repeated; but her parents endeavoured to suppress her enthusiasm. She, however, obtained the assistance of an uncle, who introduced her to De Baudricourt, the commander of a neighbouring fortress, before whom her voices, as she termed them, had ordered her to lay her divine commission. That officer at first treated her assertions with scorn; but finally, on account of the disasters that his prince had suffered, he gave her the assistance which she had requested, and in February, 1429, with a guard of five or six men, she set out on her journey for Chinon, where Charles then held his court. At this time his cause appeared to be almost desperate. Orléans, which was the only place of importance that remained to him, was closely besieged by the English. Joan appeared before him, and declared that her mission was to raise the siege and to conduct him to Rheims to be crowned. At this period she had reached her eighteenth year, and possessed a very beautiful countenance and noble form. Charles was convinced of the truthfulness of her statements, and, notwithstanding the opposition of his ecclesiastics and courtiers, raised her to the rank of a military commander, and placed a considerable body of troops at her disposal. She entered Orléans about the last of April, 1429, with a convoy of provisions, and in one week raised the siege. In battle Joan displayed great personal bravery. She subsequently gained the battles of Jargeau and Patay, in the latter of which the noted Talbot was made prisoner. Several important cities surrendered to her without resistance; and in less than three months from the time that she received her military command, Charles was crowned at Rheims, in the cathedral consecrated to the coronation of the French sovereigns. She then petitioned the king that she might be permitted to return home; but he prevailed on her to continue in the army. The following spring, as she was making a sortie against the Burgundians near Compiègne, she was captured by them and subsequently handed over to the English, who, with the Bishop of Beauvais and the University of Paris, urgently demanded her execution as a sorceress. The King of England granted their request, and Joan, after a mock-trial at Rouen, was condemned to be burnt. On the 31st of May, 1431, she was dressed in the garb of the victims of the Inquisition, and, amidst the clamours of assembled thousands, conducted to the stake, where, in a short time, her body was consumed. She died declaring that her voices had not deceived her, and with the name of Jesus on her lips. Many of those who had most eagerly sought her death were melted to tears; and even the executioner declared that he had committed an unpardonable sin. A secretary of the King of England also said, "We are lost! we have burned a saint." Thus perished the Maid of Orleans, against whom not the slightest crime could be proved. If the inspiration which she received came not from the source to which she attributed it, it was at least the offspring of bravery, of generosity, of patriotism, of those virtues which have raised to immortality so many of the great and good. In the high-coloured and eulogistic account given of her by Michelet, he remarks, "She had the goodness of the ancient martyrs, but with this difference: the early Christians remained pure and virtuous only in retiring from the encounter and in separating themselves from the struggles and temptations of the world, while she was benign in the fiercest conflicts, good among the bad, gentle even in war; 'into war, that triumph of the devil, she carried the spirit of Heaven.' This tenderness of heart she had for all men. She wept after the victories, and relieved the sufferings of the wounded English." Her death stamped indelible infamy on all the parties connected with the war,—on the Burgundians for delivering her to her inveterate enemies, on the English and their French allies for their inhuman cruelty and thirst for revenge, and on her own prince and party for not making a powerful attempt to save her.

Job, [Heb. אִיּוֹב; Gr. Ἰώβ; Arabic, AIYOOB, (AIYOUB or AIYÛB,) ī'yōōb'; Ger. HIOB, hee'op; It. GIOBBE, job'bà,] a patriarch of Uz, (a country which is believed by many to be the same as Idumæa,) who is supposed to have lived in a very remote antiquity. One of the most sublime books of the Old Testament bears his name and gives an account of his life and virtues. By many it has been thought that Job was an allegorical character; but there appears to be little reason for this supposition. He is mentioned by the prophet Ezekiel, (xv. 16,) and by Saint James, (v. 11,) as a real person. Much controversy has arisen about the age in which he lived, and the author of the book; but both these points remain unsettled. This work was written in Hebrew, with a mixture of Arabic.

Job or Aiyoob, ī'yōōb', (SOLOMON,) an African prince, son of a king of Bondoo, in Senegambia. In 1730 he was sold to the English, who carried him to Maryland, where he became a slave. His story interested General Oglethorpe and others, who ransomed him and sent him to England in 1733. He was presented at court, and attracted much attention. He produced an interesting geographical account of his native country, and wrote from memory, it is said, three copies of the Koran. He returned to Bondoo about 1735.

Jobard, zho'bâr', (J. B. A. M.,) a writer on social economy, born in Haute-Marne, France, in 1792. He lived in Belgium. Died in 1861.

Jobbé-Duval, zho'bà' dü'văl', (ARMAND MARIE FÉLIX,) a French painter, born at Carhaix, July 16, 1821. He went to Paris in 1829, and was a pupil of Paul Delaroche. He is best known by his refined and delicate religious pictures and his portraits. Died April 2, 1889.

Jobert, zho'bair', (LOUIS,) a French Jesuit and antiquary, born at Paris in 1637. For some time he was a professor of rhetoric in his native city, and afterwards became celebrated as a preacher. He was the author of several treatises on medals. Died in 1719.

Jobert de Lamballe, zho'bair' dẹh lôn'bàl', (ANTOINE JOSEPH,) an eminent French surgeon, born at Lamballe in 1799. He lectured in Paris, and published, besides other works, a "Treatise on Plastic Surgery," ("Traité de Chirurgie plastique," 2 vols., 1849.) He became surgeon to the emperor in 1854. Died in 1867.

Jo-cas'ta or Jo-cas'te, [Gr. Ἰοκάστη; Fr. JOCASTE, zho'kâst',] sometimes called Epicaste, the wife of Laius, and the mother of Œdipus. According to tradition, she was married to Œdipus without knowing who he was, and hung herself after she discovered the relationship between them.

Jode, de, dẹh yo'dẹh, (ARNOLD,) son of Pieter, Jr., noticed below, was born about 1636. He is said to have been inferior to his grandfather and father as an engraver. While in London, in 1667, he engraved for Charles I. "Mercury Instructing Cupid," by Correggio. Among his other works is "The Infant Jesus embracing Saint John."

See BASAN, "Dictionnaire des Graveurs."

Jode, de, (PIETER,) a Flemish engraver, born in 1570; died in 1634. Among the most important of his productions may be mentioned "The Last Judgment," by Cousin, and "Jesus Christ giving the Keys to Saint Peter," by Rubens.

Jode, de, (PIETER or PETRUS,) Jr., son of the preceding, was born at Antwerp about 1606. He engraved numerous pictures from Rubens, Van Dyck, Titian, and other artists. Among his best works is "The Visitation of the Virgin," after Rubens. Died after 1660.

Jodelle, zho'dĕl', (ÉTIENNE,) Lord of Lymodin, born at Paris in 1532. He was one of the seven French poets termed the "Pleiades." He is said to have been the first to write plays in the French language and to introduce choruses after the Greek manner. It is said that his fluency of composition was so great that on a wager he composed in one night five hundred Latin verses on a given subject. He died poor in 1573. His principal production was the tragedy of "Cleopatra," (1552.)

Johannot, (FRANÇOIS,) a German designer and engraver, of French extraction, was born in Hesse-Darmstadt, and lived about 1790. He settled at Paris with his partner, Charles André.

Johannot, (TONY,) a painter and wood-engraver, a son of the preceding, was born at Offenbach in 1803. He gained a wide reputation as a designer and engraver of vignettes for books. Among the works which he illustrated are "Werther," the plays of Molière, "Manon Lescaut," "Jérôme Paturot," and "The Vicar of Wakefield." Died in Paris in 1852.

John [Gr. Ἰωάννης; Lat. JOHAN'NES; Fr. JEAN, zhŏn; It. GIOVANNI, jo-văn'nee] THE DIVINE, commonly called SAINT JOHN THE EVANGELIST, with his brother James, was among the first to become a disciple of our Saviour when He commenced his ministry. John was made one of the twelve apostles; and his gentle, loving spirit appears to have especially endeared him to his divine Master. He spoke of himself as "the disciple whom Jesus loved." He was with his Master in the garden of Gethsemane. When our Saviour was nailed to the cross, He commended his mother to the care of the beloved disciple. After the resurrection and ascension of Jesus, Saint John became one of the most prominent of the propagators of the Christian religion. Syria and Asia Minor were the principal scenes of his labours. We are told by Tertullian and Saint Jerome that under the reign of Domitian, by the order of a Roman proconsul, he was immersed in a caldron of boiling oil, and that in this terrible ordeal he was miraculously preserved, so that he sustained not the slightest injury. After this he was banished to the isle of Patmos, where he wrote the Apocalypse, or Revelation. He also wrote three Epistles, and the Gospel according to Saint John. He is supposed to have died at Ephesus in 99 A.D., at the age of ninety-four.

In recent years there has been a sharp discussion as to the authorship of Saint John's Gospel. Orthodox theologians in general, with many Unitarians, like Ezra Abbot and E. H. Sears, assert that Saint John was its author.

Among all the disciples of Christ, John appears to have most fully comprehended the character and spirit of his divine Master. He first announced in clear and concise terms the great central truth of Christianity, that "God is love,"—a truth which, in his view, finds its fullest proof in the great fact that God gave His Son for the salvation of the world. (See John iii. 16, 17; and I. Epistle iv. 8, 9, 10.) The soul of "the beloved disciple" seems ever filled with the one theme. Love, not fear, is to be the motive of obedience:—"If ye love me, keep my commandments." The love to which he refers is not a mere sentiment, but a living power:—"This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments." (See John xiv. 15, 21, 23; I. Epistle iv.)

John I., surnamed ZIMIS'CES, [Gr. Τζιμισκῆς,] became Emperor of the East in 969 A.D. He carried on a successful war against the Rossi, or Russians, and quelled serious disturbances in his eastern provinces. He died of poison, as he was returning to Constantinople, in 975. He is said to have been a man of superior talents.

John III., of the family of Ducas, surnamed VATAT'ZES, born in Thrace in 1193, succeeded his father-in-law, Theodore Lascaris, in 1222, as Emperor of the East. Constantinople being then in possession of the Latins, John fixed his capital at Nicæa, in Bithynia. In 1235 he besieged Constantinople, but was repulsed. He, however, reconquered all the other possessions belonging to the Greek Empire which had been taken by the Latins. John was a liberal patron of the useful arts, and did much to promote the welfare of his subjects. Died in 1255.

John IV. (Las'caris) succeeded his father Theodore as Emperor of the East in 1259, when he was aged but six years. He was deprived of the crown in 1261 by Michael Palæologus, who put out his eyes and imprisoned him during the remainder of his life.

John V. See CANTACUZENUS.

John VI., (Palæol'ogus,) born in 1332, was a son of Andronicus, whom he succeeded on the imperial throne of Constantinople in 1341. He was afterwards imprisoned by one of his sons. During these intestine troubles the Turks attacked the capital, and forced John to conclude a disgraceful treaty. He left the throne to his son Manuel. Died in 1391.

John VII. (Palæologus) succeeded his father Manuel on the throne of Constantinople in 1425. Being unable to oppose the Turkish invaders, he sought the assistance of the Latins; and, in order to cement the union, he formed a reconciliation between the Eastern and Western Churches, which, however, lasted but a short period. Died in 1448. He was succeeded by his brother, Constantine XIII.

John [Sp. JUAN, Hoo-ân'] I., son of Peter (Pedro) IV., was born in 1350, and ascended the throne of Aragon in 1387. Died in 1395.

John (Juan) II., King of Aragon and Navarre, born in 1397, was one of the bravest and most enterprising of the Spanish sovereigns. In 1425 he ascended the throne of Navarre, as the husband of Queen Blanche, and three years later was appointed by his brother Alfonso V. to the government of Aragon. Blanche died soon after, and in 1447 he married Joan Henriquez, of the blood-royal of Castile, who became the mother of Ferdinand the Catholic. He became King of Aragon in 1458. He carried on long and successful wars against Henry IV. of Castile and Louis XI. of France. He also suppressed a formidable rebellion of the Catalans. Died in 1479.

See PRESCOTT, "Ferdinand and Isabella," chap. ii.; ERSCH und GRUBER, "Allgemeine Encyklopaedie."

John (Juan) I., King of Castile and Leon, was born in 1358. He succeeded his father Henry (Henrique) II. in 1379. He subsequently invaded Portugal, but met with a total defeat at Aljubarota in August, 1385. Died in 1390.

John II., King of Castile and Leon, son of Henry (Henrique) III., born in 1404, was proclaimed sovereign two years later. He carried on successful wars against the Kings of Aragon and Navarre and the Moors of Granada. By his first wife, Maria of Aragon, he left three children, one of whom succeeded him as Henry (Henrique) IV. By his second queen, Isabella, he had a daughter, afterwards illustrious as Isabella the Catholic. Though a feeble sovereign, he was a liberal patron of learning, and his reign was distinguished for the revival of literature in Castile. Died in 1454.

See PRESCOTT, "Ferdinand and Isabella," chap. i.; ERSCH und GRUBER, "Allgemeine Encyklopaedie."

John (Hans, hâns) I. OF DENMARK and II. OF SWEDEN, son of Christian I., of the house of Oldenburg, born in 1455, ascended the throne in 1481. About the year 1500 the Swedes rebelled against him because he had garrisoned the fortresses with Danish and German troops. He was finally obliged to resign all claims to the Swedish crown. Died in 1513.

John, King of England, surnamed SANSTERRE, ("Lackland,") the youngest son of Henry II. by his queen, Eleanor of Guienne, was born at Oxford in 1166. The king at first created him Earl of Montague, in Normandy, and in 1178 made him Lord of Ireland. In 1189 he married the daughter and sole heiress of William, Earl of Gloucester. The same year he was a confederate in the rebellion of his brother Richard. On the accession of the latter to the throne he gave John several earldoms, including about one-third of the kingdom. Soon after Richard's departure on the crusade for the Holy Land, John formed plans to obtain the crown on the event of the king's death, in opposition to the rights of his nephew Arthur, Duke of Bretagne, whom Richard had recognized as his heir. When John was informed of his brother's imprisonment in Germany, he immediately attempted to usurp the throne, but was kept in check by the loyalty of the nobles. On the king's return to England, in 1194, he deprived John of all his estates and compelled him to make a humble submission. Richard died in France in 1199, leaving his kingdom to John, who was then with him. That prince hastened to establish his authority in Normandy and his other dominions, and was crowned at Westminster in May, 1199. In 1201 he obtained a divorce from his wife, and married Isabella of Angoulême. Philip Augustus of France espoused the cause of Arthur, who commenced hostilities against John and gained several victories, but was subsequently taken prisoner by his uncle and conveyed to Rouen. Nothing further was heard from him; but the probability is that he was murdered. The war afterwards went entirely against the King of England, who in the course of two years lost the greater part of his continental possessions. During this period he drew upon himself the hostility of the Roman pontiff by insisting on his right to appoint the Archbishop of Canterbury, that see being then vacant. The pope excommunicated him and laid the kingdom under an interdict, (1208.) John, however, paid no attention to the thunders of the Vatican, but imprisoned or banished the bishops and clergy who obeyed the pope's orders. Meanwhile he reduced Llewellyn, a Welsh prince, to subjection, and suppressed a rebellion in Ireland. Finally the pope, having formally deposed him and absolved his subjects from their oaths of allegiance, instigated the French king to invade England. John, perceiving his danger, made an abject submission to the papal legate, and resigned to him the kingdoms of England and Ireland, (1213.) Philip was then forbidden to prosecute his enterprise. For a long time John's tyranny had excited the hatred of his barons. This was increased by Langton, Archbishop of Canterbury, who, presenting them with the charter of Henry I., exhorted them to obtain the liberties therein granted. A numerous body of barons solemnly swore to regain their rights or to levy an unceasing war on the king. King John, being supported by the pope, scornfully refused to make any concessions to the barons, who raised a powerful force and marched to London, where the citizens gladly received them. On the 15th of June, 1215, John consented to grant all that they required, and signed at Runnymede the famous Magna Charta. Scarcely had he done this before he induced the pope to absolve him from these obligations and to excommunicate several of his opponents. He also brought into England large bodies of foreign troops, and gained several victories over the barons. The latter then chose Louis, Dauphin of France, as their king. This prince landed at Sandwich in May, 1216. John would probably have been successful, (for dissensions were already breaking out in the camp of Louis,) had he not been carried off by a fever in October of that year. John has left one of the darkest names in the history of the English kings. He was extremely cruel, fickle, and licentious, without a redeeming virtue. He had, by his queen Isabella, five children, the eldest of whom succeeded him as Henry III. The second, Richard, was elected King of the Romans in 1257.

John [Fr. JEAN, zhŏN] I., a posthumous son of Louis X., King of France, was born in 1316. Though he lived but eight days, he is recorded among the French monarchs.

See N. DE MONMERQUÉ, "Dissertation historique sur Jean I, Roi de France," 1844.

John (Jean) II., surnamed LE BON, ascended the throne of France upon the death of his father, Philip of Valois, in 1350. Charles, King of Navarre, having accepted an invitation to meet John at Rouen, was there imprisoned, and several of his lords put to death. The people of Navarre applied to England for assistance, and Edward the Black Prince invaded France at the head of an army. John marched against him with 60,000 men, was defeated and made prisoner at the battle of Poitiers, fought in 1356, and conducted to London, where he was received with great honour by Edward III. While he remained in England a civil war broke out in France with the peasantry, known in history by the name of "La Jacquerie." In this revolt the castles of the nobility were plundered and burnt and the inmates massacred. These ravages continued for two years, until the dauphin, assisted by several powerful lords, defeated the peasants, putting thousands of them to the sword. In 1360, peace having been concluded between France and England, John returned to his capital; but, finding much opposition made by the nobles to the conditions of the treaty, he again visited England, to confer with King Edward. He was soon after taken ill, and died in London in 1364.

John [Port. João or Joam, zho-ŏwn'] I., surnamed the Great, King of Portugal, the natural son of Peter I., was born in 1357. On the death of his brother Ferdinand, in 1385, he assumed the regal power in opposition to the rights of Ferdinand's daughter Beatrix, who had married John I., King of Castile. This led to a war with Spain, in which the Portuguese monarch gained several important victories and firmly established his power. He subsequently carried on a successful war against the Moors of Africa. During his reign the Portuguese commenced those maritime expeditions which soon after rendered them so celebrated. Under the command of his son, Prince Henry, they discovered Madeira, the Canaries, the Azores, and several places on the western coast of Africa. Died in 1433.

John (João) II., King of Portugal, surnamed the Perfect, son of Alfonso V., was born in 1455, and ascended the throne in 1481. At the age of sixteen years he fought against the African Moors and took Arzile and Tangiers, and five years later gained the battle of Toro over the Castilians. Soon after his coronation he quelled a powerful conspiracy formed against him by his nobles. He encouraged the spirit of enterprise among the Portuguese, and fitted out a squadron destined for the East Indies and the Eastern Seas. Died in 1495.

John (João) III., King of Portugal, born in 1502, succeeded his father, Emanuel the Great, in 1521. In 1524 he married Catherine of Austria, to whose brother, Charles V., he gave his sister Isabella in marriage. He colonized Brazil, and sent to the Eastern Seas a fleet, by which Japan was discovered. He established the Inquisition in Portugal and its colonies. Died in 1557.

John (João) IV., surnamed the Fortunate, chief of the dynasty of Braganza, was born in 1604. He threw off the authority of Spain, to which Portugal had been subjected since the days of Philip II., and became king in 1640. He enacted many wise and beneficial laws, and died, greatly regretted by the nation, in 1656.

See Vertot, "Histoire des Révolutions de Portugal," 1689.

John (João) V., King of Portugal, born in 1689, succeeded his father, Peter II., in 1707. He joined the allies against France and Spain about 1702. After the peace of Utrecht (1713) he devoted his time to the encouragement of education and commerce. Died in 1750.

John (João) VI. of Portugal, was born in 1769, and was appointed Regent of Portugal in 1793 on account of the derangement of his mother, Maria I., who was then queen-regnant. In 1807, when the French invaded Portugal, he sailed to Brazil, where he received the title of emperor. He returned in 1821, soon after which the Brazilians revolted and declared themselves independent. Died in 1826.

John II. of Sweden. See John I. of Denmark.

John III., King of Sweden, the second son of Gustavus Vasa, was born in 1537. He married Catherine Jagellon, daughter of Sigismund, King of Poland. In 1560 he visited England, to negotiate a marriage between his elder brother Eric and Queen Elizabeth, in which he was unsuccessful. In 1568 he deposed Eric and ascended the throne in his stead. Influenced by his queen, he attempted to re-establish the Catholic religion, but was effectually resisted by his brother Charles, Duke of Sudermania, at the head of the Protestants. Died in 1592.

John, King, or Emperor, of Abyssinia, was known as Prince Kassai or Kasa, (Lij Kassa,) and was Under-Governor of Adowa. In 1867 the Emperor Theodore made him one of the kings of Tigré. In 1868 he assisted the English in their march against Theodore, after whose fall John received from the conquerors large amounts of military stores. Civil wars followed, but in 1872 John was crowned at Axoom. In 1876 he repelled an Egyptian invasion, and in 1879 he received the allegiance of Menilek, King of Shoa. Died March 12, 1889.

John (Jean) I., Duke of Bretagne, was born in 1217. Having attempted to check the papal encroachments, the pope excommunicated him, and he was obliged to go to Rome to obtain absolution. Died in 1284.

John II., son of the preceding, was born in 1239. He married Beatrix, daughter of Henry III. of England, from whom he received the title of Count of Richemont. He was also made a peer of France by Philippe le Bel. He was killed at the ordination of Clement V. at Lyons by the falling of a wall.

John III., Duke of Bretagne, surnamed the Good, succeeded his father, Arthur II., in 1312. He is said to have been a just and benevolent prince. Died in 1341.

John IV., Duke of Bretagne, known as Jean de Montfort, half-brother of the preceding, was born in 1293. John (Jean) III., having no children, willed the dukedom to Charles de Blois; but Jean de Montfort, regarded by many as the legitimate heir, soon reduced all the towns and provinces to his subjection, and went to England to render homage to King Edward for his estates. On his return he was summoned before the court of peers to prove his claims to Bretagne. The peers decided against him, and he raised an army to defend his rights, but was shortly after taken prisoner by the Duke of Normandy and confined in the tower of Louvre at Paris. In the mean time the war was carried on with energy by his duchess, Jeanne of Flanders. At the expiration of nearly four years, John escaped, disguised as a merchant. He died soon after, in 1345.

See Daru, "Histoire de Bretagne."

John (Jean) V., (or John IV., according to some authorities,) Duke of Bretagne, born in 1338, was a son of the preceding. He married Mary, a daughter of Edward III. of England. By a decisive victory over his competitor, Charles de Blois, at Auray, in 1364, he obtained possession of Bretagne. He afterwards fought for the English against the French, who drove him out of Bretagne about 1374; but he was soon restored. Died in 1399.

See Sismondi, "Histoire des Français."

John (Jean) VI., son of the preceding, became Duke of Bretagne in 1399, when he was ten years of age. He carried on a war against the Count of Penthièvre and the Duke of Burgundy, and afterwards joined the English under the Duke of Bedford against France. Died in 1443.

John, surnamed the Fearless, [Fr. Jean Sans Peur, zhŏn sŏn pur,] Duke of Burgundy, born at Dijon in 1371, was the eldest son of Philip the Bold. At the age of twenty-five he assisted Sigismund, King of Hungary, against the Turks, by whom he was made prisoner at the battle of Nicopolis. When taken before the Sultan Bayazeed, (Bajazet,) he evinced so much courage that that sovereign gave him his liberty and the surname of Sans Peur, (the "Fearless.") After his return to France he was engaged in fighting the English and in political intrigues at the French court. He was appointed guardian of the dauphin of France in 1406. He caused the assassination of his rival, the Duke of Orléans, in 1407, and obtained almost unlimited power in the kingdom. He was murdered in 1419, at the instigation of the dauphin, son of Charles VI.

John, [Ger. JOHANN, yo'hän,] surnamed THE CONSTANT, a son of the Elector Ernest, was born in 1467, and became Elector of Saxony in 1525. He was a zealous defender of the Protestant faith, and in 1530 caused the Confession of Augsburg to be proclaimed in the Diet assembled at that city. Died in 1532.

John [Lat. JOHAN'NES; Fr. JEAN, zhŏn; It. GIOVANNI, jo-vän'nee] I., a native of Tuscany, was raised to the Roman see upon the death of Hormisdas, in 523. He was sent on an embassy to Constantinople by King Theodoric to obtain toleration for the Arians; and on his return, having displeased that monarch, he was thrown into prison, where he died in 526.

John II., surnamed MERCURIUS, was a native of Rome, and succeeded Boniface II. in 532 or 533. Died in 535.

John III., a native of Rome, succeeded Pelagius I. in 560. Died about 573, and was succeeded by Benedict I.

John IV., a Dalmatian, succeeded Severinus in 640. He condemned the doctrines of the Monothelites and the edict of the emperor Heraclius, called "The Exposition of Faith," which was issued in their defence. Died in 642, and was succeeded by Theodorus.

John V., a native of Antioch, in Syria, was chosen pope on the death of Benedict II., in 685, and died in 687. Conon succeeded him.

John VI., a Greek, succeeded Sergius I. in 701. During his pontificate Wilfred, Archbishop of York, was tried and acquitted of the charges preferred by the English clergy. Died in 705.

John VII., a native of Greece, was elected successor to the preceding. Died in 707. Sisinnius succeeded him.

John VIII., (called John IX. by those who admit the truth of Pope Joan's history,) was a native of Rome, and succeeded Adrian II. in 872. He crowned the emperor Charles the Bald, and afterwards Charles le Gros. He confirmed Phocius Patriarch of Constantinople. In 878 the Saracens invaded Italy and compelled him to pay tribute. Died in 882. He was succeeded by Martin II.

See ARTAUD DE MONTOR, "Histoire des souverains Pontifes."

John IX., an Italian, became pope in 898, after the death of Theodore II. Died about 900.

John X. was elected in 915, through the influence of his mistress Theodora, as successor to Lando. He crowned Berengarius as emperor. Subsequently, with the assistance of this sovereign, he marched against the Saracens, who had invaded Italy, defeated them, and drove them from the country. At this time Guido, Duke of Tuscany, with his wife, the infamous Marozia, possessed great power in Rome. John, having offended them, was seized in his palace by their soldiers and put in prison, where he is said to have been killed in 928.

John XI., elected pope in 931, was the son of Marozia, as some suppose, by Pope Sergius III. Alberico, another son of Marozia, raised a revolt against his mother, whom he imprisoned with John in the castle of Sant' Angelo. The latter died about 936, and was succeeded by Leo VII.

John XII., son of Alberico, was elected successor to Agapetus II. in 956, when he was but eighteen years old. He changed his name from Octavianus. Four years later he crowned Otho I. Emperor of Germany and King of Italy. Subsequently he became so notorious for his oppression and licentiousness that Otho returned to Rome in 963 and caused John to be deposed and Leo VIII. to be chosen in his place. But, as soon as Otho left Italy, John entered Rome at the head of a powerful party, drove out Leo, and committed great atrocities. He died in 964. One of his mistresses, named Joan, exercised much influence at Rome during his pontificate; and it has been suggested that this may have given rise to the story of "Pope Joan."

See BARONIUS, "Annales."

John XIII., Bishop of Narni, was raised to the papal see in 965 by the influence of the emperor Otho I. The Romans, however, being opposed to this election, imprisoned John. Otho marched to Rome, liberated him, and hanged several of his opponents. John crowned Otho II., son of Otho I., as emperor. Died in 972, and was succeeded by Benedict VI.

John XIV., Bishop of Pavía, was raised to the papal see, as successor to Benedict VII., about 984. After a pontificate of nine months, he was deposed by Boniface VII. and put in prison, where he is supposed to have been poisoned in 985.

John XV., elected successor to John XIV., died a few days after. By some he is left out of the order of popes.

John XVI., a native of Rome, became pope about 986. During his pontificate, a patrician, named Crescentius, caused great disturbances and drove the pope from Rome. He was, however, reinstated in his authority by the emperor Otho. Died in 996, and was succeeded by Gregory V.

John XVII., whose previous name was PHILAGATHIUS, a native of Calabria, and Bishop of Piacenza, was chosen pope in 997 by the faction of Crescentius, in opposition to Gregory V. Otho III., espousing the cause of the latter, executed Crescentius with his adherents, and imprisoned John after having horribly mutilated him.

John XVIII. was elected successor to Sylvester II. in 1003, and died four months afterwards.

John XIX., elected pope in 1004. He sent Saint Bruno to preach Christianity to the Russians, and healed the schism between the Churches of Rome and Constantinople. Died in 1009, and was succeeded by Sergius IV.

John XX., previously named ROMANUS, was the son of Count Gregory of Tuscany, and brother of Benedict VIII., whom he succeeded in 1024. In 1027 he crowned Conrad as emperor. He died in 1033 or 1034, and was succeeded by Benedict IX.

John XXI., born in Lisbon, was elected successor to Adrian V. about 1276. He died after a pontificate of a few months. Nicholas III. succeeded him.

John XXII., a native of Cahors, in France, and previously known as JACQUES D'EUSE, or JAMES OF OSSA, was chosen to succeed Clement V. in 1316. He was consecrated at Lyons, and made his residence at Avignon. At this period there was a competition for the throne of Germany between Louis of Bavaria and Frederick of Austria. John, who declared that he had the right to appoint the emperor, excommunicated Louis in 1324 or 1327, and advanced the claims of Robert, King of Naples. This led to a long war in Italy between the Guelphs, who were allies of Robert, and the Ghibelines, who were assisted by the troops of Louis. At first the Guelphs had the advantage; but their opponents soon gained ground, and in 1327 Louis visited Italy and received the iron crown of Milan. At Rome the Bishops of Venice and Alería crowned him emperor, after which he deposed John and appointed Peter de Corvara in his place, with the name of Nicholas V. After the return of Louis to Germany the Guelphs began to obtain the ascendency. John died at Avignon in 1334. He possessed extraordinary abilities, was devoted to study, and wrote some medical treatises. His avarice, however, was the most prominent trait in his character; and to him is attributed the introduction of the Annates, or First-Fruits. He left, besides his jewels, eighteen millions of golden florins in his coffers.

See ARTAUD DE MONTOR, "Histoire des souverains Pontifes;" PLATINA, "Historia de Vitis Pontificum Romanorum;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

John XXIII., (or XXII., according to some authorities,) (Cardinal COSSA,) a Neapolitan, was elected as successor to Alexander V. in 1410, during a schism of the Church. His title was disputed by two rivals, Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII. He was a man of depraved morals and of insatiable cupidity. A quarrel between John and Ladislaus of Naples resulted in the expulsion of the former from Rome. John applied for support to the emperor Sigismund, who convoked at Constance in 1414 a general council. This council (at which John was present) required him to abdicate the popedom. He pretended to comply, but left Constance disguised, and fled towards Rome with the intention to resist the decree of the council. He was quickly arrested and brought back to Constance, where he was convicted of many heinous offences, and formally deposed, in 1415. He was confined in prison about three years. He died at Florence in 1419.

John, (Juan,) DON, OF AUSTRIA, one of the most celebrated military and naval commanders of the sixteenth century, was the natural son of the emperor Charles V. and Barbara Blomberg, a native of Germany. He was born at Ratisbon in 1546, and passed as the son of a Spanish nobleman named Quixada, by whom he was educated. Charles V. on his death-bed recommended him to the protection of Philip II., who soon after acknowledged John as his brother and made appropriations which enabled him to live in princely state. At the age of twenty-two he was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces sent against the Moriscoes of Granada, whom he vanquished in several battles and finally reduced to complete subjection. In 1571, war having been declared between Philip II. and the Sultan, Don John was appointed generalissimo of the combined fleets of Spain and Italy. He sailed from Messina in the middle of September with two hundred and fifty ships of war and about fifty thousand men, and on the 7th of October encountered the Turkish fleet in the Gulf of Lepanto, where he gained one of the greatest naval victories of which history makes mention. Soon after the battle of Lepanto he received an embassy from the Greeks of Albania and Macedonia, requesting him to assist them against the Turks and to receive the sovereignty of their countries. Don John was prevented from accepting the offer by Philip, who, jealous of his brother's reputation, refused the assistance necessary for the enterprise. Don John, in a subsequent expedition against Africa, took Tunis, Biserta, and several other important places. He was appointed in 1576 Governor of the Netherlands, which were then in a state of rebellion. He at first used conciliatory measures; but the States, suspecting him of duplicity, declined his overtures and prepared for war. Don John soon after took Namur by stratagem, and on the 1st of January, 1578, gained the decisive victory of Gemblours. He afterwards reduced Louvain, Nivelle, and other towns belonging to the insurgents. While thus actively engaged, in October, 1578, he was seized with an illness which carried him to the grave. Strong suspicions were entertained by many that he was poisoned.

John, yōn, (EUGENIA,) a German novelist, best known by the pseudonym of E. MARLITT. She was born at Arnstadt, December 5, 1825. Adopted by the Princess of Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, she was trained as a singer; but, having lost the sense of hearing, she became a very successful and prolific writer of romances. "The Twelve Apostles," "Gold Else," and "The Second Wife" are among her works. Died in 1887.

John or Johann, (NEPOMUK MARIA JOSEPH,) born in 1801, succeeded his brother Frederick Augustus as King of Saxony in 1854. He was distinguished for great virtues as a ruler, and for his literary attainments. He translated Dante's "Divine Comedy." He was an ally of Austria in the war against Prussia in 1866. Died Oct. 29, 1873.

John, surnamed CLIMACUS or CLIMACHUS. See CLIMACUS.

John OF GIS'CALA or GISCHALA, a Jewish captain, was an enemy of Josephus the historian. He was the chief of one of the factions of zealots and outlaws that fought against each other and against the Romans in Jerusalem while that city was besieged by Titus, in 70 A.D. On the capture of the city he was imprisoned for life.

John OF LUXEMBURG, surnamed THE BLIND, son of the emperor Henry VII., was born in 1295. In 1309 he was elected King of Bohemia, and in 1322 he conquered Silesia. In 1331 he formed a league with Louis of Bavaria, Emperor of Germany, against Pope John XXII., and entered Italy. The pope then offered to recognize him as King of Italy. The emperor, in order to prevent this, invaded Bohemia. John left the command of his army in Italy to his son, returned to Bohemia, and drove out Louis. He was soon after attacked with a disease in his eyes, which produced blindness, but did not in the least affect his spirit of enterprise. He invaded Poland, reduced it to subjection, and formed an alliance with Philip of France against the English. He was mortally wounded at the battle of Crécy, in 1346, after having performed great feats of valour.

John (Johann) Baptist, (JOSEPH FABIAN SEBASTIAN,) Archduke of Austria, born in 1782, was a son of Leopold II. He succeeded Kray in 1800 as commander of the Austrian army, and was defeated by General Moreau at Hohenlinden, in December of that year. In the campaign of 1809 he directed the operations in the Tyrol, and gained a victory over the viceroy Eugene. In June, 1848, he was elected Vicar of the German empire by the Parliament at Frankfort. He resigned that office in December, 1849. Died in 1859.

John Cas'I-mir, [Ger. JOHANN CASIMIR, yo'hân kâ'ze-mîr,] Count Palatine, born in 1543, was the second son of the Elector-Palatine Frederick III. He was a zealous Calvinist, and in 1568 raised an army with which he invaded Lorraine to aid the French Huguenots. In 1575 he again entered France, as the ally of the Prince of Condé. His court at Neustadt became the centre of the Calvinist policy. After the death of his father, John Casimir was the political chief of the Reformers. Died in 1592.

John of Gaunt or Ghent, Duke of Lancaster, a younger son of Edward III. King of England, was born in 1340. His birthplace, Ghent, in Flanders, then called in English Gaunt, (after the French Gand,) gave him the designation by which he is generally known. He served in early youth under his eldest brother Edward the Black Prince in the French wars, where he gained great distinction for his skill and bravery. He married Constance, a natural daughter of Peter the Cruel, King of Castile and Leon, and, on the death of that monarch, laid claim to the sovereignty of those kingdoms, but was defeated by Henry of Trastamara. He subsequently gave his daughter in marriage to the heir-apparent of the crowns of Castile and Leon, upon which he resigned his own claims. His third wife was a sister-in-law of the poet Chaucer, to whom he proved a liberal patron. Died in 1399. His son, surnamed Bolingbroke, afterwards ascended the throne of England, with the title of Henry IV.

John the Baptist, [Fr. JEAN BAPTISTE, zhŏn bă'tēst'; It. GIOVANNI BATTISTA, jo-vän'nee bät-tis'tä,] son of Zacharias, a Jewish priest, and his wife Elisabeth. It was foretold of him that he should come in the spirit and power of Elias, to prepare the way of the Lord. (Luke i. 17.) Our Saviour also said that no prophet was greater than John the Baptist. (Luke vii. 28.) He began to preach and to baptize in the desert country through which the Jordan flowed. It was here that Jesus received baptism and was proclaimed by him as the promised Messiah. He was subsequently cast into prison, and beheaded by the order of Herod.

See Mark vi. 16–30.

Johnes, jŏnz, ? (THOMAS,) an English scholar and bibliomaniac, born at Ludlow, in Shropshire, in 1748. He was twice elected a member of Parliament. He translated Froissart's "Chronicle," and other literary works, from the French. Died in 1816.

Johns, (JOHN,) D.D., an American bishop, born in Newcastle, Delaware, July 10, 1796. He graduated at Princeton College in 1815, took orders in the Episcopal Church, was appointed Assistant Bishop of Virginia in 1842, and in 1862 succeeded Bishop Meade as diocesan. He was for some time president of William and Mary College, and of the Theological Seminary of Virginia. Died April 5, 1876.

John'son, (ALEXANDER B.,) an author and banker, born in Gosport, England, in 1786. He settled in Utica, New York, in 1801, and engaged in banking operations in that town. He devoted his leisure to the study of the nature of human knowledge, or ideas irrespective of the words by which they are expressed. The results of his investigation are his "Philosophy of Human Knowledge, or a Treatise on Language," (1828,) a "Treatise on Language, or the Relation which Words bear to Things," (1836,) and other publications on the same subject. His "Physiology of the Senses" (1856) was highly commended by the "Westminster Review." He also published a "Treatise on Banking." Died Sept. 9, 1867.

John'son, (ANDREW,) the seventeenth President of the United States, was born at Raleigh, North Carolina, in 1808. He learned the trade of a tailor, which he followed for many years at Greenville, Tennessee. He was self-educated, and, it is said, never attended any school. In 1828 he was elected alderman, and in 1830 mayor, of Greenville. After he had served several terms in the legislature of Tennessee, he was elected a member of Congress by the Democrats in 1843, and continued in that body for ten years. He was chosen Governor of Tennessee in 1853, and again in 1855. In 1857 he was elected a United States Senator for six years. Having taken a decided stand against the disunion movement in 1860 and 1861, he was appointed Military Governor of Tennessee by President Lincoln in 1862. He was elected Vice-President of the United States by the Republicans in November, 1864, and, on the death of Mr. Lincoln, became President in April, 1865. On his accession to office he displayed at first a spirit of great severity against the rebels, but soon afterwards adopted a line of policy in relation to the reconstruction of the seceded States which was very favourable to them. His policy, which tended to restore the domination of the secessionists and to reduce the freedmen again to many of the evils of slavery, was rejected by a majority of Congress; and a violent contest ensued between that body and the President, who vetoed numerous acts passed by Congress for the reconstruction of the Southern States, etc. His vetoes, however, were overruled by a majority of two-thirds in each House, and the policy of Congress prevailed. In the course of a tour from Washington to Chicago, in 1866, he made many undignified political speeches, which rendered him very unpopular, and in the next elections his opponents, the Radicals, obtained large and increased majorities. He opposed impartial suffrage, recommended repudiation, and co-operated with the Democratic party. He pardoned a large number of counterfeiters. In August, 1867, he suspended Mr. Stanton, secretary of war, and appointed General Grant secretary ad interim. The Senate of the United States reinstated Mr. Stanton in January, 1868, and President Johnson quarrelled with General Grant because he gave up the war office to Mr. Stanton. Great excitement was produced by the attempt of the President to remove Mr. Stanton in February, and he was impeached of high crimes and misdemeanours by a large majority of the House of Representatives. Among the crimes charged against him was the violation of the "Act regulating the Tenure of certain Civil Offices," by the removal of Mr. Stanton without the consent of the Senate. The trial before the Senate began about March 13, and ended, May 26, in his acquittal. Thirty-five Senators voted that he was guilty, and nineteen voted not guilty. Among the latter were seven Republicans. Died July 31, 1875.

Johnson, (GEORGE,) an English physician, born at Goudhurst, Kent, in November, 1818. He was educated at King's College, London, and graduated in 1842 at the London University. He was professor of materia medica in King's College, 1857–63, of the practice of medicine, 1863–76, and in 1876 took a professorship of clinical medicine. Among his works are "On Diseases of the Kidney," (1852,) "The Laryngoscope," (1864,) "Lectures on Bright's Disease," (1873,) etc.

Johnson, (HELEN KENDRICK,) an American author, daughter of Rev. Dr. A. C. Kendrick, and wife of Rossiter Johnson. She was born at Hamilton, New York, January 4, 1843, and was married in 1869. She is the author of "The Roddy Books," (3 vols., 1874–76,) and "Our Familiar Songs, and those who made them," (1881,) and has edited several compilations.

Johnson, (ISAAC,) one of the founders of Massachusetts colony, came from England with Governor Winthrop in 1630. He and three others organized, July 30, the church of Boston at Charlestown; but, for the want of good water, they removed to Shawmut, now Boston, which was settled under Johnson's supervision. Died in 1630.

Johnson, (JAMES,) an Irish physician, born about 1777, practised in London. He published, besides other medical works, a "Treatise on the Influence of Tropical Climates on European Constitutions," and "The Economy of Health." Died in 1845.

See "Life of Dr. James Johnson," by his son, 1846.

Johnson, (JOHN,) a learned nonjuring divine, born in Kent, England, in 1662. He was the author of "Holy David and his Old English Translation Cleared," written in answer to one of the works of Baxter, "The Clergyman's Vade-Mecum," (1708,) and several other works Died in 1725.

See THOMAS BRETT, "Life of John Johnson," 1748.

Johnson, (Sir JOHN,) a general, son of Sir William, noticed below, was born in 1742. He was a royalist in the Revolution, instigated the Indians to fight for the king, and conducted several raids from Canada against the State of New York. Near the close of last century he was appointed Governor of Upper Canada. Died in 1830. See his "Life," by J. W. de Peyster.

Johnson, (JOSEPH,) M.D., brother of Judge William Johnson, was born in Charleston in 1776. He practised as a physician in his native city, and in 1807 was chosen president of the Medical Society of South Carolina. He took an active part in the literary and political movements of Charleston, was long mayor of the city, and a prominent leader of the party which opposed nullification in 1832–33. He wrote a valuable work entitled "Traditions and Reminiscences of the Revolution," (1851.)

Johnson, (MANUEL JOHN,) an English astronomer, born about 1805. He was astronomer of the Radcliffe Observatory of Oxford, and published "Astronomical Observations," (13 vols., 1845–55.) Died in 1859.

Johnson, (MARTIN,) an English landscape-painter and seal-engraver of the time of Charles II. Died about 1685.

Johnson, (MAURICE,) an English lawyer and antiquarian, born in Lincolnshire. He founded an antiquarian society at Spalding, and wrote several commentaries. Died in 1755.

Johnson, (REVERDY,) an American lawyer, son of Judge Johnson, was born in Annapolis, Maryland, May 21, 1796. He studied at Saint John's College, was admitted to the bar in 1815, and followed his profession with great success in Baltimore. He was also extensively engaged in cases before the supreme court of the United States. In 1845 he was elected by the Whigs to the United States Senate. This position he resigned in 1849 to accept the attorney-generalship of the United States, tendered him by President Taylor. On the death of General Taylor, in July, 1850, Mr. Johnson resumed his profession in Baltimore. In connection with Thomas Harris, he published seven volumes of reports of the Maryland court of appeals, (from 1800 to 1826.) He was elected a Senator of the United States for six years, (1863–69,) and appointed minister to England in June, 1868. He negotiated in relation to the Alabama claims a convention which the Senate of the United States rejected almost unanimously. He was recalled early in 1869. Died February 10, 1876.

Johnson, (RICHARD,) a commentator and grammarian, born in England. Among his works are "Noctes Nottinghamicæ," and "Grammatical Commentaries." Died in 1721.

Johnson, (RICHARD MENTOR,) ninth Vice-President of the United States, was born near Louisville, Kentucky, in 1780. He studied at Transylvania University, and practised law with success. Elected a representative to Congress in 1807, he zealously supported the administration of President Madison, and was regularly re-elected for a period of twelve years. On the breaking out of the war of 1812, he raised and commanded a regiment of mounted riflemen on the Indian frontier. In 1813 he again took the field, and contributed greatly to Harrison's victory of the Thames, (October 5, 1813.) The Indian chief Tecumseh, who fell in this battle, is generally believed to have been killed by Colonel Johnson, who was dangerously wounded. In 1819 he was transferred to the United States Senate, of which he was a member for ten years. He was again returned to the House of Representatives in 1829, and was regularly re-elected till chosen Vice-President in 1837, Van Buren being the President. None of the candidates for Vice-President having on that occasion received a majority of votes in the electoral college, Colonel Johnson was elected by the United States Senate. He was again the candidate for the Vice-Presidency on the ticket with Van Buren in 1840, but was defeated. Died in 1850.

Johnson, (RICHARD W.,) an American general, born in Kentucky about 1827, graduated at West Point in 1849. He commanded a division at the battle of Stone River, December 31, 1862–January 2, 1863, and at Chickamauga, September 19 and 20, 1863. He served under General Sherman in Georgia in May, 1864.

Johnson, (ROBERT,) an English composer of sacred music, who flourished in the middle of the sixteenth century. Little is known of his life beyond the fact that he was an ecclesiastic. There was another Robert Johnson, who composed music for the London theatres from about 1610 to 1621.

Johnson, (ROSSITER,) an American author, born at Rochester, New York, January 27, 1840, graduated at Rochester University in 1863. He is the author of "Phaeton Rogers," (1881,) "Idler and Poet," poems, (1882,) "History of the War of 1812," (1882,) "History of the Old French War," (1883,) etc., and editor of various books and series.

John'son, (SAMUEL,) an English divine, memorable for his undaunted support of the Protestant cause, was born in Staffordshire in 1649. Soon after he had taken orders he removed to London. He became an earnest advocate of the bill of exclusion against James, Duke of York, and published a tract entitled "Julian the Apostate," (1682,) in which he refuted the arguments in favour of passive obedience. For writing this article he was tried and imprisoned; but during his confinement he issued several treatises against popery. In 1686 he wrote "An Humble and Hearty Address to all the English Protestants in the Present Army." For the production of this essay he was sentenced to stand three times in the pillory, to pay a fine of five hundred marks, and to be publicly whipped from Newgate to Tyburn. He bore all these sufferings with great firmness. He subsequently wrote in favour of the Revolution, and also of William of Orange, on whose accession he was rewarded with a present of £1000 and an annuity of £300. Died in 1703.

Johnson, (SAMUEL,) an eccentric English dramatic writer, born in Cheshire about 1705. He wrote, besides other comedies, "Hurlothrumbo, or the Supernatural." Died in 1773.

See BAKER, "Biographia Dramatica."

Johnson, (SAMUEL,) one of the most eminent English writers of the eighteenth century, a son of Michael Johnson, a bookseller, was born at Lichfield, September 18, 1709. He commenced his studies in his native town, and subsequently continued them at a school in Stourbridge. In 1728 he entered Pembroke College, Oxford. From boyhood he had been afflicted with the scrofula, which greatly impaired his eyesight and weakened his constitution. To this may be attributed the natural indolence which he never fully succeeded in overcoming. Notwithstanding these obstacles, he acquired such stores of knowledge that, when he was examined at Oxford, one of the officers pronounced him to be the best prepared among all those who had entered since his remembrance. Three years afterwards he was under the necessity of leaving college, on account of the narrowness of his resources. The same year, his father dying under pecuniary embarrassments, he obtained employment as usher to a school in Market-Bosworth. The duties of this office, however, soon became so irksome that he threw it up and removed to Birmingham, where he had made an engagement to contribute to a newspaper. It was there, also, that he produced his first book, an abridged translation from the French of "Father Lobos' Voyage into Abyssinia," for which he received the small compensation of five guineas. In 1736 he married Mrs. Porter, the widow of a mercer. This lady is described as being nearly twice his age, and as having vulgar manners, a loud voice, and florid complexion. Johnson said, however, that it was a love-match on both sides.

Not long after, he attempted to establish an academy at Edial Hall, where he obtained only three pupils, one of whom was David Garrick. In 1737 he went to London, accompanied by Garrick. In a short time he produced, in imitation of the third Satire of Juvenal, a poem on London, which attracted great attention. Pope remarked "that the author, whoever he was, would not be long concealed." It was in the metropolis that Johnson formed a friendship for the poet Savage, with whom he frequently walked the streets at night because they were too poor to procure lodgings. In 1740 he wrote the parliamentary speeches for the "Gentleman's Magazine," and in 1744 published the "Life of Richard Savage." Three years later he commenced his English Dictionary. In March, 1749, the first number of the "Rambler" was issued. Johnson continued this periodical until his wife's death, in 1752, which affected his mind so deeply that he suspended many of his literary labours. In 1762 George III. granted him a pension of £300 per annum; and from that time he was enabled to live in ease and independence. He became a member of the famous literary club to which Burke, Goldsmith, Reynolds, and many other celebrated men belonged. He received the degree of LL.D. in 1765 from the University of Dublin, but did not assume the title until several years later, when the same honour was conferred on him by the University of Oxford. He was also treated with marked attention by the king, to whom he was introduced at the library in Buckingham House. In 1773 he made an excursion to the Western Islands of Scotland, of which he wrote an account, and two years later visited Paris. In 1781 he finished the "Lives of the British Poets," the last of his literary works. He died in 1784, from the effects of dropsy and asthma.

Johnson's intellect was incisive, comprehensive, and profound; and, when free from the influence of prejudice or passion, his judgments are, generally speaking, remarkably just. He seemed to seize, instantaneously and without effort, the essential features of the subject under discussion, and his decisions are often expressed with a clearness and force that make a vivid and indelible impression upon the minds of his readers. He was pre-eminently distinguished for his conversational powers; in society he was original, pointed, logical, and fond of argument, in which no one but Burke could successfully encounter him. Much of the intolerance and ill temper which he too often betrayed on such occasions must be ascribed to distressing and deep-rooted bodily infirmities, which powerfully reacted upon his mind. If his disposition was irritable, his heart was essentially kind and generous. Few persons, with means so limited as his, ever spent more for charitable or benevolent purposes. "He loved the poor," says Mrs. Thrale, "as I never yet saw any one else love them. . . . He nursed whole nests of people in his house, where the lame, the blind, the sick, and the sorrowful found a sure retreat." Francis Barber, the servant and friend of Dr. Johnson, was originally a Jamaica slave. It is related that Johnson, on making his will, asked his physician what would be a sufficient annuity for a faithful servant. Being told that fifty pounds a year would be regarded as adequate in the case of a nobleman, "Then," he said, "I shall be nobilissimus; for I mean to leave Frank seventy pounds a year." "That, with all his coarseness and irritability," says Macaulay, (who will scarcely be accused of any undue partiality to Johnson,) "he was a man of sterling benevolence, has long been acknowledged. But how gentle and endearing his deportment could be was not known till the 'Recollections of Madame D'Arblay' were published." Although certainly not wanting in a proper respect for dignities, he possessed a true Saxon independence of character, of which his well-known letter to Lord Chesterfield furnishes a fine illustration. He was a sincere and humble believer in the great truths of Christianity, which he ably upheld and defended.

Johnson was great in all the branches of literature to which he devoted his attention. Few men have exerted so great an influence while living,—an influence which will probably be felt far into the future. His poems, which are chiefly descriptive and satirical, have been greatly admired by some of the most eminent critics. "I have had," said Sir Walter Scott, "more pleasure in reading 'London' and the 'Vanity of Human Wishes' than any other poetical composition that I can mention." Of the latter Byron remarks, "'Tis a grand poem, all the examples and mode of giving them sublime." His romances and plays attracted less attention. He was particularly unsuccessful with his female characters. Burke aptly remarked that among his dramatis personæ "all the ladies introduced were Johnsons in petticoats." His excellence in literary criticism lies in his strength, perspicuity, and originality of thought. His critical observations are generally extremely just (as already intimated) when not biased by prejudice. He had not, however, that nice discrimination or sensibility requisite in order to appreciate poetical beauties of a delicate or subtle kind. His most important critical works are the "Preface and Notes to Shakspeare," and "The Lives of the British Poets." His English Dictionary, upon which he bestowed vast labour for several years, is probably the most remarkable work of the kind ever produced by a single person. His style, precise and stately, was much admired and imitated during his lifetime; but at present the prevailing taste in literature has pronounced it too artificial and elaborate to be ever used as a model.

Johnson, (SAMUEL,) D.D., born in Guilford, Connecticut, in 1696, graduated at Yale in 1714. Having become an Episcopalian, he took holy orders in England in 1722, and on his return settled at Stratford. He was chosen president of King's College in 1754. This position he resigned in 1763. Died in 1772. He wrote, besides other works, a "System of Morality."

Johnson, (SAMUEL,) an American author, born at Salem, Massachusetts, October 10, 1822. He graduated at Harvard College in 1842, and at the Cambridge Divinity School in 1843. He became a preacher of the Free Religious movement. He was one of the compilers of two collections of hymns for advanced Unitarian congregations, and was himself the author of some fine hymns. He published "The Worship of Jesus," (1868,) and a laborious work on "Oriental Religions," (1872 et seq.) He was an able orator and writer, and a man of pure and noble, but somewhat eccentric, life. Died February 19, 1882.

Johnson, (SAMUEL FROST,) an American painter, born in New York city, November 9, 1835. He studied art in New York, Dusseldorf, (1860,) and Antwerp, (1863.) After his return to New York he became a professor in the art-schools of the Metropolitan Museum.

Johnson, (SAMUEL WILLIAM,) an American chemist, born at Kingsborough, New York, July 3, 1830, was educated in the scientific school at New Haven, and in the German universities. In 1856 he became professor of agricultural chemistry at Yale College. Among his books are "Essays on Manures," (1859,) "Peat and its Uses," (1866,) "How Crops Grow," (1868,) "How Crops Feed," etc.

Johnson, (THOMAS,) a lieutenant-colonel in the royal army, distinguished as a botanist, was born at Selby, in Yorkshire. He received from the University of Oxford the title of M.D. He was mortally wounded at the siege of Basinghouse, in 1644. He wrote several botanical works.

Johnson, (THOMAS,) an English scholar, born in Oxfordshire, was educated at Cambridge, where in 1692 he received the degree of M.A. He edited Sophocles, (1705,) and other classical works. Died about 1750.

Johnson, (VIRGINIA WALES,) an American novelist, born in Brooklyn, New York, December 28, 1849. Her principal books are "Kettle Club Series," (1870,) "Joseph the Jew," (1873,) "A Sack of Gold," (1874,) "The Calderwood Secret," "Miss Nancy's Pilgrimage," "The Catskill Fairies," "A Foreign Marriage," "The Neptune Vase," "The English Daisy Miller," etc.

Johnson, (WALTER ROGERS,) an American chemist and geologist, born in Leominster, Massachusetts, about 1794. He graduated at Harvard in 1819; and, while professor of mechanics, natural philosophy, etc. in the Philadelphia High School, he contributed largely by lectures and essays towards introducing an improved system of common-school education in Pennsylvania. He afterwards made important investigations in the geology of that State, particularly the coal formations, filled for four years (1839–43) the chair of chemistry in the Medical University of Pennsylvania, and in 1844 published, by order of Congress, his "Report on the Different Varieties of Coal." Died in 1852.

Johnson, (WILLIAM,) judge of the supreme court of the United States, was born in Charleston, South Carolina, in 1771. He was a brother of Joseph, noticed above. He graduated at Princeton, with the highest honours of his class, in 1790, rose to distinction at the bar of his native State, and was appointed judge by Jefferson in 1801. He died, while undergoing a surgical operation, in New York, in 1834. He published "The Life and Correspondence of Major-General Greene," (2 vols., 1822.)

Johnson, (Sir WILLIAM,) a British military officer, born about 1715, was employed in North America, and had great influence over the Indians. He commanded an expedition sent against Crown Point in 1755, and defeated the French and their Indian allies. He wrote a short work "On the Customs and Languages of the American Indians." Died in New York in 1774.

See "Life and Times of Sir W. Johnson," by W. L. STONE, 1865.

Johnson, (WILLIAM B.,) a Baptist minister, born near Charleston, South Carolina, in 1782. He presided over the Baptist Convention of South Carolina for twenty-five years or more. He was the author of several religious works. Died in 1862.

Johnson, (WILLIAM SAMUEL,) F.R.S., an eloquent American lawyer and scholar, born at Stratford, Connecticut, in 1727, graduated at Yale in 1744. Having been sent as a colonial agent to England in 1766, he became an acquaintance of the celebrated Dr. Johnson, with whom he corresponded for many years. He was elected to Congress in 1785, was a member of the convention which formed the Federal Constitution in 1787, and was elected a United States Senator for Connecticut in 1789. He was president of Columbia College, New York, from 1791 until 1800. Died in 1819.

Johns'ton, (ALBERT SYDNEY,) an eminent American general, born in Mason county, Kentucky, in 1803, graduated at West Point in 1826. Having resigned his commission in 1834, he enlisted as a private soldier in the army of Texas in 1836. He soon became commander-in-chief, in place of F. Houston, with whom he fought a duel about 1837. He was secretary of war of the republic of Texas, 1838–40, and served as colonel of the army of the United States in the Mexican war, (1846–47.) In 1849 he was appointed paymaster of the army of the United States. Having been raised to the rank of colonel, he commanded the expedition sent to Utah against the Mormons in 1857. In 1860 he took command of the department of the Pacific. He offered his services to the secessionists in 1861, and was appointed commander of the department of Kentucky and Tennessee. He occupied a fortified position at Bowling Green in the autumn of 1861. The capture of Fort Donelson, February 16, 1862, having rendered this position untenable, he moved hastily southward into Tennessee, and formed a junction with the army of General Beauregard at Corinth. About six weeks were spent in this disastrous retreat. He collected a force of about 50,000 men at Corinth, and attacked the army of General Grant at Shiloh on the 6th of April, 1862. He was killed about two P.M. on the first day of this battle, by a ball, which cut an artery of his leg. "A. S. Johnston," says Mr. Greeley, "was probably the ablest commander at any time engaged in the rebel service." ("American Conflict.")

Johns'ton, (ALEXANDER,) a Scottish painter, born in Edinburgh in 1816. His works mostly represent scenes of Scottish life, or Scottish history. Died in 1891.

Johnston, (ALEXANDER,) an American publicist, born at Brooklyn, New York, April 29, 1849. He graduated at Rutgers College in 1870, was admitted to the bar in 1876, and in 1883 was appointed professor of jurisprudence and political economy in Princeton College. Among his works are a "History of American Politics," (1879,) "The Genesis of a New England State: Connecticut," (1883,) and a small "History of the United States," (1884.) Died July 20, 1889.

Johnston, (ALEXANDER KEITH,) an eminent geographer, was born at Kirkhill, in Scotland, in 1804. In order to be thoroughly informed upon geography, he made himself acquainted with the French, Spanish, Italian, and German languages. His first important work, the "National Atlas," was issued in 1843. In 1848 he published a valuable "Physical Atlas," which greatly extended the celebrity of its author. He was elected a member of the Geographical Societies of Berlin and Paris, of the Geological Society of London, and the Royal Society of Edinburgh. Of the other works of Mr. Johnston may be mentioned "A Dictionary of Geography," (1850,) and an "Atlas of the Historical Geography of Europe." He died July 9, 1871.

See "Blackwood's Magazine" for April, 1849.

Johnston, (Dr. ARTHUR,) a Scottish physician and poet, eminent for his classical learning, was born in Aberdeenshire in 1587. He pursued his studies mostly on the continent, and in 1610 received the degree of M.D. at Padua. He afterwards resided at Paris several years, and on his return to England, in 1632, was appointed physician-in-ordinary to Charles I. Died in 1641. He contributed to Sir John Scott's collection of Latin poems, and composed, in Latin, "Poetical Paraphrases of the Psalms of David," (1637.) "I am inclined to think," says Hallam, "that Johnston's Psalms do not fall far short of those of Buchanan, either in elegance of style or in correctness of Latinity."

See IRVING, "Lives of Scottish Writers;" CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen."

Johnston, (ELLEN,) a Scottish poetess, born at Hamilton, the daughter of a mason, was a factory-girl. She published "Poems and Songs," (1869,) which have merit. She died young, in a poor-house at Glasgow, in 1873.

Johnston, (JOHN,) an eminent physician and natural philosopher, born in Poland in 1603. He graduated at the Universities of Leyden and Cambridge. He wrote, besides other works, in Latin, the "Wonders of Nature, divided into Ten Classes," which was a natural history of beasts, birds, fishes, and insects. Died in 1675.

Johnston, (JOHN,) LL.D., an American scientist, born at Bristol, Maine, August 23, 1806. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1832, and was professor of natural science in Wesleyan University, 1837–79. He wrote a "Manual of Chemistry," (1840,) "Natural Philosophy," (1846,) "Primary Natural Philosophy," (1858,) "History of Bristol and Bremen, Maine," (1873,) and many scientific papers. Died at Clifton, New York, December 2, 1879.

Johnston, (JOSEPH EGGLESTON,) an able American general, born in Prince Edward county, Va., February 3, 1807. His mother, whose maiden name was Wood, was a niece of Patrick Henry. He graduated at West Point in 1829, gained the rank of captain in 1846, and served with distinction in the Mexican war, 1846–47. In June, 1860, he was appointed quartermaster-general, with the rank of brigadier-general. He resigned his commission in April, 1861, and was immediately appointed a major-general, or general, by Jefferson Davis. He took command of a force at Harper's Ferry in May, 1861, and was opposed in that vicinity by General Patterson. Having eluded Patterson, he moved his army rapidly to Manassas, and effected a junction with the army of Beauregard on the 20th or 21st of July. General Johnston was superior in rank to Beauregard, but he waived his claim to precedence in the battle of Bull Run, July 21. He remained inactive at Manassas Junction during the autumn of 1861 and the ensuing winter. About the 8th of March, 1862, he changed his base and retired behind the Rapidan. He soon moved his army to the peninsula to oppose McClellan, and, having been repulsed at Williamsburg, May 5, retreated towards Richmond. On the 31st of May he attacked a part of the Union army at Fair Oaks, or Seven Pines. In this battle he received a severe wound, which disabled him for several months. In November, 1862, he was assigned to the command of a department comprising Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi. He reported in April, 1863, that he was still unfit for active service in the field. After General Grant approached Vicksburg from the south, General Johnston moved a small army to relieve that place, and reached Jackson on the 13th of May. He was defeated on the 14th, abandoned Jackson, and retreated to Canton. On the 29th of May he wrote to General Pemberton, "I am too weak to save Vicksburg. Can do no more than attempt to save you and your garrison." In December, 1863, he took command in person of the army which had recently been defeated by General Grant near Chattanooga, and which was required to oppose the advance of General Sherman towards Atlanta. He began this campaign with about 55,000 men, occupying a strong and fortified position at Dalton, Georgia. This position having been turned by the Union army, Johnston fell back to Resaca, where he was attacked on the 15th of May. After a severe battle, he retreated in the ensuing night, closely pursued, and reached Cassville, near the Etowah River, on the 19th. Having crossed the Etowah under cover of the night, General Johnston made another stand in the strong position of Allatoona Pass, to dislodge him from which General Sherman ordered a flank movement to Dallas. General Johnston attacked the Federals at Dallas on the 28th of May, was repulsed, and on the 4th of June retreated to Kenesaw Mountain. On the 27th of June, General Sherman made an unsuccessful assault on the works at Kenesaw, but he resorted again to a flank movement, which compelled General Johnston to abandon Kenesaw on the 2d or 3d of July, and to retreat across the Chattahoochee. He was removed from the command on the 18th of July, 1864. Before this date he had attained the rank of general, the highest in the service. He obtained command of an army in South Carolina about February, 1865, and on the 18th of March attacked the advance of General Sherman's army at Bentonville, North Carolina. He retreated to Smithfield on the 21st of March, and surrendered his army to General Sherman on the 26th of April, 1865, on the same terms as were granted to General Lee. Died March 21, 1891.

Joinville, de, (JEAN or JEHAN,) SIRE, a French nobleman and chronicler of high reputation, born in Champagne in 1224. He grew up at the court of Thibaut, King of Navarre and Count of Champagne, and in 1248 raised several hundred armed men from among his tenants and accompanied Louis IX. in his first crusade to the Holy Land. He soon became a great favourite with this monarch. Joinville distinguished himself for bravery at the capture of Damietta in Egypt, and was subsequently, with Louis, made prisoner at Mansoorah. He returned to France with the king in 1254. He wrote a very interesting work entitled "History of Saint Louis IX., King of France, by Jehan Sire de Joinville." "In this history," says Ambrose Firmin Didot, "which is one of the most precious monuments of ancient or modern times, the Christian, the man of the world, the friend of the king, and the naïf historian, display themselves with such naturalness, simplicity, and candour that the reader can penetrate the inner heart of the author by the simple recital which he has given us. . . . His natural and easy style has all the charm of conversation." ("Nouvelle Biographie Générale.") He is supposed to have died about 1317.

Jonas or Jonæ, (RUNOLPH,) a scholar and author, born in Iceland, graduated at Copenhagen, where he fixed his residence after 1649. He wrote "Elements of the Northern Languages," and "Rudiments of the Icelandic Grammar." Died in 1654.

Jon'a-than, [Heb. יְהוֹנָתָן,] son of King Saul, and the most intimate friend of the psalmist David. The death of this prince, who fell with his father, near Mount Gilboa, while fighting the Philistines, furnished the subject of one of the most beautiful of David's songs.

See I. Samuel xviii., xix., xx.; II. Samuel i. 17–27.

Jon'athan Ap'phus, (af'fus,) a celebrated Jewish leader and high-priest, succeeded his elder brother, Judas

Maccabæus, in 161 B.C., as chief ruler of his nation. For seventeen years he governed with wisdom and justice, and carried on successful wars with many of the surrounding nations. During the civil dissensions in the kingdom of Syria he was decoyed into the city of Ptolemais and massacred with his entire escort.

Jonathan Ben Uz-zī'el (or uz'ze-el) or U-zī'el, a Jewish rabbi, supposed to have been contemporary with the prophets Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. He was the author of the "Targum," a Chaldaic paraphrase of most of the Hebrew prophetical books.

Jonckbloet, yonk'bloot, (WILLEM JOSEPH ANDREAS,) a Dutch author, born at the Hague, July 6, 1817. He was educated at Leyden, and held professorships of the Dutch language and literature at Groningen and Leyden. He published histories of poetry in the Netherlands, and of Dutch literature. Died in 1885.

Joncourt, de, deh zhôN'koor', (ELIE,) a Dutch writer, of French extraction, born at the Hague in 1707. He was one of the editors of the "Bibliothèque des Sciences et des Arts," (50 vols., 1754–80,) and wrote various works. Died about 1775.

Jonctys, yonk'tĭs, (DANIEL,) a Dutch littérateur and physician, born at Dort, lived many years at Rotterdam. Among his works was an able treatise against torture. Died in 1654.

Jones, jōnz, (ANSON,) an American physician, President of the republic of Texas at the time of its annexation, was born in Berkshire county, Massachusetts, in 1798. He settled in Brazoria, Texas, in 1833, took a prominent part in the political and military movements which resulted in the independence of that republic, was minister to the United States in 1838, and afterwards for three years secretary of state under President Houston. In 1844 he succeeded Houston as President. Died by his own hand in 1858.

Jones, (CHARLES COLCOCK,) JR., an American author, born at Savannah, Georgia, October 28, 1831. His father was the Rev. Dr. C. C. Jones, (1804–63,) an eminent Presbyterian divine. The younger Jones graduated at Princeton College in 1852. He became a lawyer, was an officer in the Confederate army, and after 1865 removed to New York. Among his works are "Ancient Tumuli in Georgia," (1869,) and "Antiquities of the Southern Indians," (1873.) Died July 19, 1893.

Jones, jōnz, (DAVID,) a Welsh poet, born in Caernarvonshire, was also a collector of Welsh manuscripts. Died about 1780.

Jones, (DAVID R.,) an American general, born in South Carolina about 1827, graduated at West Point in 1846. He served as brigadier-general in the army of General Lee at Antietam, September 17, 1862. Died in 1863.

Jones, (EDWARD,) a Welsh musician and bard, born in Merionethshire about 1750. He published, besides other works, "Musical and Poetical Relics of the French Bards," (1784.) Died in 1821.

Jones, jōnz, (ERNEST,) M.P., an English poet and Chartist. He became the leader of the Chartist movement about 1846. He was imprisoned about two years for his radical political speeches, (1848–49.) Among his works are "The Wood Spirit," (1841,) and "Chartist Lyrics." He was elected a member of Parliament in 1869, and died the same year.

Jones, (GRIFFITH,) a clergyman, born in Wales in 1684, was very active in supporting schools and in circulating the Bible among his indigent countrymen. He wrote several educational treatises in Welsh and English. Died in 1761.

Jones, (GRIFFITH,) an English author, born in 1721. He edited at different times several periodicals, and was connected with Dr. Johnson in the "Literary Magazine" and with Goldsmith in the "British Magazine." Among his works are "Great Events from Little Causes," and several "Liliputian Histories." Died in 1786.

Jones, jōnz, (HENRY,) an Irish poet and dramatic writer, born at Drogheda about 1720, was by trade a bricklayer. His productions attracted the attention of the Earl of Chesterfield, then lord lieutenant of Ireland, who took him to England and procured a large subscription for his poems. Among his works we may cite the "Tragedy of the Earl of Essex," (1753,) and "The Cave of Idra." Died in 1770.

Jones, (HENRY BENCE,) F.R.S., an English physician, writer, and lecturer on medical subjects, born at Lowestoft in 1813. He graduated at Cambridge in 1836, and commenced the study of medicine. In 1846 he was elected physician to Saint George's Hospital, and a Fellow of the Royal Society. His principal works were "Animal Chemistry," "Lectures on Pathology and Therapeutics," and "The Life and Letters of Faraday." Died in London, April 20, 1873.

Jones, (HUGH BOLTON,) an American artist, born at Baltimore, October 20, 1848. Among his best pictures are "The Poplars," "Tangier," "The Wayside Pool," "The Return of the Herd," "October," "On Herring Run," and "The Ferry Inn." In 1883 he was elected to the National Academy of Design, New York.

Jones, (INIGO,) a distinguished architect, styled "the English Palladio," was born in London about 1572. Being apprenticed to a joiner, his talent for designing attracted the attention of the Earl of Pembroke, who furnished him with means to travel through Europe. While in Italy, he accepted an invitation from Christian IV. to visit Denmark. The sister of that monarch was the queen of James I. of England; and thus the way was paved to the royal patronage when he reached his native land in 1605. In a short time he was appointed architect to the queen and to Prince Henry, in which position he formed a friendship with Ben Jonson. They subsequently quarrelled, and the poet ridiculed him in several plays. In 1612 he visited Italy a second time; and it was at this period that he fully adopted the classic style of architecture, which was then but little known in England. On his return he became surveyor-general of the royal buildings. He died in 1653. Of the edifices designed and constructed by him may be mentioned the palace at Whitehall, and the west front of Old Saint Paul's. He was an accomplished classical scholar, and wrote a work entitled "Stonhenge Restored."

See PETER CUNNINGHAM, "Life of Inigo Jones," 1848; CAMPBELL, "Vitruvius Britannicus," 5 vols., 1767; BRITTON, "Dictionary of Architecture," 1830–38.

Jones, (JACOB,) COMMODORE, an American naval officer, born in Kent county, Delaware, in 1770. He became a lieutenant about 1801, and in October, 1812, commanded the sloop-of-war Wasp, with which he captured the British sloop Frolic, which carried more guns than the Wasp. He was promoted to the rank of post-captain in 1813, and obtained command of the frigate Macedonian. Died in Philadelphia in 1850.

Jones, (JAMES CHAMBERLAIN,) a United States Senator, born in Davidson county, Tennessee, in 1809. In 1841 he was chosen by the Whigs Governor of the State, James K. Polk being his competitor. He was re-elected in 1843, when Mr. Polk was again the opposing candidate. In the National Whig Convention of 1848 Governor Jones strenuously advocated the nomination of Henry Clay; but after the selection of General Taylor as the choice of the Convention he entered the canvass warmly in his support, and spoke to large audiences in different States of the Union. He was elected to the United States Senate in 1851, and served the full term of six years. He supported the Kansas-Nebraska bill in 1854, and thenceforward acted principally with the Democratic party. Died in 1859.

Jones, (JEREMIAH,) a learned and eloquent English dissenting minister, born in 1693, published an important work entitled a "New and Full Method of Settling the Canonical Authority of the New Testament," (2 vols., 1726,) which is said to be the best English work on the subject. Died in 1724.

Jones, (JOHN,) a physician and medical writer, supposed to have been born in Wales about 1500. He was educated at Cambridge, and practised at Bath, in England. Among his works was "The Art and Science of Preserving the Body and Soul in Health," (1579.)

Jones, (JOHN,) a Benedictine, born in London in 1575. He studied at Oxford, where he roomed with Laud, afterwards the celebrated archbishop. Having become a Roman Catholic, he went to Spain, became a monk, and continued his studies at Compostella. He was subsequently appointed professor of Hebrew and divinity at Douay. He was the author of several theological works. Died in London in 1636.

Jones, (JOHN,) a Welsh antiquary, who collected and transcribed numerous old manuscripts in his native language. Fifty large volumes of these are yet preserved. He is supposed to have died about 1600.

Jones, (JOHN,) the author of "Adrasta, or the Woman's Spleen," (1635,) and other dramatic works, lived in England during the reign of Charles I.

Jones, (JOHN,) a clergyman of the Church of England, born in Wales in 1700, and educated at Oxford. In 1751 he became rector of Boulne-Hurst, and in 1755 vicar of Hitchin. Four years later he was chosen by Dr. Young, the poet, to be his curate. He wrote "Catholic Faith and Practice," (1765,) and other religious works. Died about 1770.

Jones, (JOHN,) LL.D., a Unitarian minister, born in Carmarthenshire about 1765. About 1795 he was appointed pastor of a congregation at Plymouth Dock, and afterwards at Halifax, in Yorkshire. He subsequently removed to London. He was the first to introduce the use of Greek-and-English dictionaries. Previous to his time the Greek had been studied entirely with the aid of books written in Latin. Of his numerous works we may mention "Illustrations of the Four Gospels, founded on Circumstances peculiar to our Lord and the Evangelists," (1808,) and "A Greek-and-English Lexicon," (1823.) Died in 1827.

Jones, (JOHN,) a lawyer and writer, born in Carmarthenshire in 1772, was admitted to the bar in 1803. Among his works are "A History of Wales," and "Cyfamod Newydd," a translation of the New Testament from the Greek into Welsh. Died in 1838.

Jones, (JOHN GALE,) an English political orator, born in 1771, advocated republican or radical opinions. He was prosecuted for some political offence, defended by Romilly, and acquitted. Died in 1838.

Jones, (JOHN M.,) an American general, born in Virginia about 1820, graduated at West Point in 1841. He became a captain in 1853, and resigned his commission in 1861. He served as a brigadier-general in the army of General Lee, and was killed near Spottsylvania, May 10, 1864.

Jones, (Colonel LESLIE GROVE,) an English political writer, born in 1779. He served in the Peninsula as aide-de-camp of the Duke of Wellington. He contributed letters to the "London Times." Died in 1839.

Jones, (NOBLE WIMBERLY,) a physician and patriot, born in Georgia in 1725. He was an early and active promoter of the Revolution, was a delegate to Congress in 1775, and was taken prisoner at Charleston in 1780. In 1781 he was again elected to Congress. Died in 1805.

Jones, (OWEN,) an antiquary, born in Denbighshire, Wales, in 1740. He published a large collection of ancient Welsh poetry, and the "Archæology of Wales," containing several historical documents. Died in 1814.

Jones, (OWEN,) an architect, born in Wales about 1809. In 1837 he visited Granada, and in 1842 published "Plans, Elevations, Sections, and Details of the Alhambra," with a translation of the Arabic inscriptions, and a historical account of the sovereigns of Granada from the Spanish. He chiefly devoted his attention to ornamental architecture, in which he soon acquired distinction. In 1852 he was appointed "Director of Decorations" at the Crystal Palace in London. He displayed his taste and artistic knowledge with a very happy effect in arranging and ornamenting the various courts of that building. Among his writings are "Designs for Mosaic and Tessellated Pavements," (1842,) and the "Grammar of Ornament," (1856.) Died in 1874.

Jones, (PAUL; originally JOHN PAUL,) a famous naval officer, born at Arbigland, in Scotland, in 1747. He emigrated to Virginia, entered the colonial naval service in 1775, was appointed a captain in August, 1776, and took command of the Ranger, a vessel of eighteen guns, about June, 1777. He sailed to Europe in that year, cruised on the coast of Scotland, and made a bold attack on Whitehaven, where he burnt some shipping. He also captured the Drake, a sloop of war. Early in 1779 he was transferred to the Bonhomme Richard, which carried about forty-five guns. Having several smaller vessels under his command, he captured or destroyed many British vessels. In September he attacked the Serapis, a frigate of forty-four guns, which surrendered after a long battle. His own ship was so much damaged in this action that she sank a few hours after. Congress voted Captain Jones a gold medal for this victory. He entered the Russian service, with the rank of rear-admiral, in 1788; but, having quarrelled with one of the Russian admirals, he was soon removed from the command. He died in Paris in 1792.

Jones, (RICE,) a Welsh poet, born in 1715. He published "Welsh Anthology," (1770.) Died in 1801.

Jones, (RICHARD,) a Welshman, published about 1654 "Gemma Cambricum," a work of great ingenuity, in which all the books and chapters of the Bible were abbreviated and written in his native dialect.

Jones, (ROGER,) an American general, born in Virginia. He fought against the British on the northern frontier in 1813 and 1814, and became adjutant-general in 1825. Died in 1852.

Jones, (SAMUEL,) an American major-general, born in Virginia, graduated at West Point in 1841. He took arms against the Union in 1861, and commanded in Western Virginia in 1862–63. He was killed at the battle of the Wilderness, May 5, 1864.

Jones, (STEPHEN,) born in London in 1763. He was the editor of the Whitehall "Evening Post," the "Biographia Dramatica," and a "Biographical Dictionary," (2d edition, 1796.) Died in 1827.

Jones, (Sir THOMAS,) chief justice of the common pleas during the reign of James II. He openly opposed the encroachments of the king on the laws of England, and was dismissed from office in 1686.

See MACAULAY, "History of England," vol. ii. chap. vi.

Jones, (THOMAS M.,) born in Virginia about 1835, became a brigadier-general in the Confederate army about 1862.

Jones, (THOMAS RYMER,) an English physician and surgeon, distinguished as a comparative anatomist and physiologist, was born about 1810. He was educated at London and Paris. He was appointed professor of comparative anatomy in King's College, London, and in 1840 became Fullerian professor of physiology in the Royal Institution of Great Britain. In 1844 he was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society. Among his works may be mentioned "A General Outline of the Animal Kingdom," (1841,) and "The Natural History of Animals," (1st vol., 1844.) Died December 10, 1880.

Jones, (THOMAS WHARTON,) a British oculist and physiologist, born at Saint Andrew's, Scotland, about 1808. He published, besides other works, a "Treatise on Ophthalmic Medicine and Surgery," and became professor of ophthalmic medicine in University College, London.

Jones, (Sir WILLIAM,) an English judge under James I. and Charles I., was born in 1566. He wrote several legal works, and became a judge of the king's bench in 1625. Died in 1640.

Jones, (WILLIAM,) an able mathematician, born in the island of Anglesey in 1680. He taught mathematics for several years, and corresponded with the most distinguished scientific men of that age. He was the friend of Newton and of Halley, and the father of the eminent Orientalist Sir William Jones. He held the office of vice-president of the Royal Society. Died in 1749. Among his productions are "A Compendium of the Art of Navigation," (1702,) and several works in defence of the theories of Newton.

Jones (WILLIAM) of Nayland, a learned Episcopal divine and multifarious writer, born in Northamptonshire, England, in 1726, graduated at Oxford in 1749. Of his productions we may mention "Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity proved from Scripture," (1756,) an "Essay on the First Principles of Natural Philosophy," (1762,) "A Course of Lectures on the Figurative Language of the Holy Scriptures," (1786,) and two political treatises against the French Revolution, entitled "A Letter from Thomas Bull to his Brother John," and "The Scholar armed against the Errors of the Times." He was perpetual curate of Nayland. Died in 1800.

See WILLIAM STEVENS, "Life of W. Jones of Nayland," 1801.

Jones, [Lat. JONE'SIUS,] (Sir WILLIAM,) an eminent Orientalist, son of William Jones, noticed above, (1680–1749,) was born in London September 28, 1746. He lost his father when he was three years of age; but his mother, a lady remarkable both for her learning and accomplishments, ably superintended his education. In 1753 he was placed at the Harrow School, of which Dr. Thackeray was preceptor. Jones early distinguished himself for his classical acquirements, and at the age of seventeen entered University College, Oxford, with more learning than many good scholars have carried thence. The following year he left Oxford, to become tutor to the son of Earl Spencer, in whose family he continued to reside for five years. During this period he devoted much of his time to the acquirement of the Oriental languages. He was also versed in nearly all the European tongues. In 1768, at the request of the King of Denmark, he translated the "Life of Nadir Shah" from the Persian into French. The year following he issued a valuable Persian Grammar. In 1770 he began the study of law, and in 1774 he was admitted to the bar. In March, 1783, he was appointed judge of the supreme court of judicature at Fort William, in Bengal, and received the order of knighthood. Soon after he married Anna Maria Shipley, a daughter of the Bishop of Saint Asaph. In the following September Sir William Jones reached India, where he continued to pursue his Oriental studies with unabated zeal. He also organized (about 1785) the "Asiatic Society," for the purpose of obtaining further information relative to the sciences, antiquities, languages, and history of Asia. He died at Calcutta on the 27th of April, 1794, after a short illness. In the branch of literature to which he devoted his attention he undoubtedly surpassed all other Europeans. He is, however, to be equally esteemed for his noble qualities and Christian virtues as for his vast erudition. Among his numerous works are "Commentaries on Asiatic Poetry," commenced in his twenty-first year, and containing translations from the most distinguished Hebrew, Persian, Arabic, and Turkish poets, treatises "On the Gods of Greece, Italy, and India," "On the Second Classical Book of the Chinese," "On the Musical Modes of the Hindus," and a translation of the "Institutes of Manu," and a prose translation of Kâlidâsa's celebrated poem "Sacontala," ("Sakoontalâ,") both from the original Sanscrit. He was also author of several works on the laws of England and of India.

Jonesii," Leyden, 1822; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale;" "Edinburgh Review" for January, 1805; CARY, "Lives of English Poets from Johnson to Kirke White."

Jones, (WILLIAM ALFRED,) an American writer and critic, was born in 1817. He graduated at Columbia College in 1836. He has contributed largely to various periodicals, and published several volumes of essays. His "Characters and Criticisms" (2 vols., 1857) was highly commended by Washington Irving.

Jones, (WILLIAM BASIL,) D.D., an English bishop, born at Cheltenham in 1822. He graduated at Trinity College, Oxford, in 1844, was a Fellow of Queen's College, 1848–51, and of University College, 1851–57, and a tutor, 1854–65. In 1867 he became archdeacon and canon of York. In 1874 he was consecrated Bishop of Saint David's. Among his works are "Vestiges of the Gael in Gwynedd," (1851,) "History of Saint David's," (1856,) "Notes on the Œdipus Tyrannus of Sophocles," (1862,) "New Testament, with a Plain Commentary," (1865,) and "The Peace of God," (1869.)

Jong, de, deh yong, (LUDOLF,) a Flemish painter of battle- and hunting-scenes, born near Rotterdam in 1616; died in 1697.

Jongelingx, yong'eh-links', (JACOB,) a Flemish sculptor, born at Antwerp in 1531. Among his works is a monument to Charles the Bold at Bruges. Died in 1606.

Jonin, zho'nân', (GILBERT,) a French Jesuit and poet, born in Auvergne in 1596. He translated into Latin, with many modifications, the Odes of Anacreon, which he published under the title of "The Christian Anacreon." He wrote several Greek and Latin odes. Died at Tournon, March 9, 1638.

Jonsius, yon'se-ûs, (JOHANN,) a German scholar, born at Flensburg in 1624. He wrote, besides other works, "De Scriptoribus Historiæ Philosophicæ," (1659,) which was once highly prized. Died at Leipsic in 1659.

Jon'son or Johnson, (BEN,) one of the most celebrated English poets and dramatists, was born at Westminster in 1574. His father, a Protestant clergyman, died a month previous to his birth. Jonson's mother subsequently married a master-bricklayer, who sent him to Westminster, then under the charge of Camden, to whom he afterwards dedicated the drama entitled "Every Man in his Humour." Jonson regarded his preceptor through life with esteem and affection. In his sixteenth year he entered the University of Cambridge; but, on account of his straitened circumstances, he was obliged to leave college and to assist his step-father as a mason. Becoming disgusted with this employment, he enlisted in the army in Flanders, and greatly distinguished himself by his bravery. When he returned, as Gifford observes, "he brought little but the reputation of a brave man, a smattering of Dutch, and an empty purse." He soon afterwards joined a company of actors; but, having killed one of them in a duel, he was thrown into prison, and narrowly escaped with his life. During his confinement he was converted by a priest to the Roman Catholic religion. Subsequently, after a careful examination, he renounced his adopted faith, and was again received into the communion of the Church of England. In 1598 he produced "Every Man in his Humour," drama, which at once brought him into notice. One of the characters of this play is said to have been performed by Shakspeare. It was followed by numerous productions, which added to the fame he had already acquired. About 1605 he assisted Chapman and Marston in writing "Eastward Hoe." This was regarded as a libel on the Scots, and his associates were thrown into prison, whither he voluntarily accompanied them. The three poets were condemned to lose their ears and noses; but, through Jonson's influence at court, they escaped. He was shortly afterwards created poet-laureate by James I., with an annual pension of £100 and a tierce of Spanish wine. Jonson died in 1637. On his death-bed he expressed the deepest penitence for the profanity that he had introduced into his plays, which, with this exception, are far purer in morals than the other dramas of that age. Jonson's convivial habits (perhaps his greatest weakness) caused him to suffer from poverty in his declining years. He was accustomed to meet Shakspeare and other distinguished persons at the drinking-houses of London. He also gave costly entertainments at his own residence. He was brave, generous, and benevolent, and governed by the highest principles of honour. Towards his friends he was unwavering in his attachment, and was easily reconciled to those who had injured him. As a poet he exhibits uncommon classical learning, great intellectual power, and acuteness of perception. He unquestionably deserves much praise for refining English poetry and the morals of the English stage. "I think him," says Dryden, "the most learned and judicious writer which any theatre ever had. . . . If I would compare him with Shakspeare, I must acknowledge him the most correct poet, but Shakspeare the greater wit. Shakspeare was the Homer or father of dramatic poets. Jonson was the Virgil, the pattern of elaborate writing. I admire him, but I love Shakspeare." Jonson was most successful in satirical comedies, the style of which he obtained from the ancients. To the refinement and thought displayed in his writings may be attributed the ill success which many of them first met with among the English people, whose taste had been vitiated by the low wit and obscenity which they had been accustomed to hear from the stage. Among the most important of his dramas are "Cynthia's Revels," (1600,) "Sejanus," (1603,) "Volpone," (1605,) "The Alchemist," (1610,) and "Catiline's Conspiracy," (1611.)

Jordaens, yor'dȧns, (JAKOB,) a distinguished painter, born at Antwerp in 1594. He studied under Van Oort, but was indebted for the most of his artistic knowledge to Rubens, by whom he was subsequently employed. He painted with rapidity and ease, and his colouring was rich and harmonious; but he was deficient in elegance and loftiness of conception. Among his numerous works are "Jesus Christ in the Midst of the Doctors," (a painting which has been frequently attributed to Rubens,) "The Adoration of the Shepherds," "Saint Peter Cutting off the Ear of Malchus," and "The Satyr and the Man who Blew Hot and Cold." Died in 1678.

Jordan, zhor'dôn', (CAMILLE,) a French politician and orator, born at Lyons in 1771. He was distinguished for his moderate principles during the Revolution, and his attachment to the Catholic religion, which he bravely defended. Having been proscribed by the Directory, he sought an asylum in Switzerland in 1797, and afterwards in Germany, where he became acquainted with Goethe, Schiller, and other men of note. Jordan returned to France about 1800. During Bonaparte's administration he led a private life; but upon the accession of Louis XVIII. he was ennobled, and elected to the Chamber of Deputies. He wrote several works of a political nature. Died in 1821.

Jor'dan, (DAVID STARR,) Ph.D., M.D., an American zoologist, was born at Gainesville, New York, January 19, 1851. He graduated in the scientific department of Cornell University in 1872, and as M.D. at Indiana University in 1875, was a special agent of the United States census for the marine industries of the Pacific coast from 1879 to 1881, was professor of biology in Butler University, Indianapolis, from 1875 to 1879, and in the Indiana University after 1879. Among his works are a "Manual of Vertebrates," (1876,) and a "Synopsis of the Fishes of North America," (1883,) besides a great number of scientific papers.

Jor'dan, (DOROTHEA,) or DOROTHY Bland, a celebrated actress, born at Waterford, Ireland, about 1762. In 1785 she made her appearance in London at Drury Lane Theatre, where she enjoyed the highest popularity. She subsequently became the mistress of the Duke of Clarence, (afterwards William IV.,) to whom she bore ten children. This connection being suddenly broken off by the duke in 1811, Mrs. Jordan retired to France, where she died in 1816 in great poverty. As an actress she possessed uncommon versatility, and excelled both in comedy and tragedy.

Jordan, hor-dȧn', (ESTEBAN,) a Spaniard, born at Valladolid in 1543, excelled in painting, architecture, and sculpture, but devoted his attention chiefly to the last-named art. Philip II. appointed him his first sculptor. Among his most admired productions are "Saint Peter," "Saint Paul," and "The Adoration of the Kings." Died in 1605.

Jordan, yor'dȧn, (JOHANN CHRISTOPH,) a noted antiquary, and privy councillor to the King of Bohemia, was the author of annotations on Livy, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Polybius, and Diodorus Siculus. Died about 1740.

Jordan, (JOHANN PETER,) a German (Wendish) scholar, born at Zischowitz, Upper Lusatia, February 15, 1818. He studied at Prague. His works include a "Wendish Grammar," a "History of Bohemia," a Polish-German and two Czech-German dictionaries, etc.

Jordan, (Sir JOSEPH,) an English admiral, who commanded at the victory of Solebay, which was gained over the Dutch in 1672.

Jordan, (RUDOLF,) a German painter, born at Berlin about 1810. His delineations of fisher-life in Helgoland are greatly admired: among these we may name "The Shipwreck" and "The Death of the Pilot." Died 1887.

Jordan, (SYLVESTER,) a German jurist and politician, born near Innspruck in 1792. He was imprisoned about twelve years for his liberal opinions, and was released in 1845. Died in 1861.

Jordan, (THOMAS,) an English poet and dramatist, lived in London; died about 1685.

Jor'dan, (THOMAS,) an American officer in the Confederate service, born in Virginia about 1821, was made a brigadier-general in 1862.

Jordan, yor'dȧn, (WILHELM,) a German poet, born at Insterburg, Prussia, February 8, 1819. He was educated at Leipsic, Königsberg, and other universities, and was when young distinguished as a republican agitator and orator. Besides a "History of Hayti," (1846–49,) he published a large number of volumes of verse, including "Demiourgos," (1852,) a bold and thoughtful attempt at a poetical theodicy. He also published several parts of a new "Nibelungenlied," besides translations of Sophocles, Homer, and Shakspeare.

Jordy, zhor'de', (NICOLAS LOUIS,) a French general, born at Abreschwiller in 1758; died in 1825.

Jore, zhor, (CLAUDE FRANÇOIS,) a French printer, lived about 1750, was a friend of Voltaire, for whom he published several works. He wrote "Six Letters to Voltaire," and some other productions.

Jorgenson, yor'gȩn-son, written also Jürgensen, (JORGEN,) a Danish adventurer, born at Copenhagen in 1779. Having gone to England in early youth, he was some years later promoted to the command of an English vessel, and during the war between England and Denmark sailed for Iceland. On the 25th of June, 1809, he landed with twelve English sailors and took the governor, Count Trampe, prisoner, and proclaimed that Iceland was free and independent of Denmark. With a force of eight Icelanders, he continued to exercise undisputed sway over the island until August, when the British restored it to its former government. During this revolution not a gun was fired nor a drop of blood shed. The inhabitants feared to resist, as their capital lay exposed to the guns of Jorgenson's vessel. Soon after his return to England he became very dissipated, and was finally convicted and transported to New South Wales, where he is supposed to have died. While in Newgate, before his transportation, he wrote a work entitled "The Religion of Christ the Religion of Nature."

He was the author of numerous works, among which perhaps the most important is an extremely valuable dictionary, entitled "Tarafat," (i.e. "Definitions.") Jorjânee enjoyed the favour of the great conqueror Tamerlane. Died in 1413.

Jor-nan'dēs or Jor-da'nes, a distinguished Gothic historian of the sixth century, was secretary to the Gothic kings of Italy. Having embraced Christianity, he was ordained Bishop of Ravenna in 552. The most important of his works is a "History of the Goths" until the reign of Vitiges, who was conquered by Belisarius, ("De Getarum sive Gothorum, Origine et Rebus gestis.") It was first printed at Augsburg in 1515, and is highly prized. He also wrote an abridgment of universal history, entitled "De Regnorum et Temporum Successione."

Jor'tin, (John,) D.D., an English divine and critic, of French extraction, born in London in 1698. Soon after graduating at Cambridge he settled in his native city, where he gained great distinction for his eloquence and learning. He was appointed Archdeacon of London in 1764. Of his works may be mentioned a volume of "Latin Poems," (1722,) which are classed among the most finished of the modern productions in that language, "Miscellaneous Observations on Authors, Ancient and Modern," (2 vols., 1732,) "Remarks upon Ecclesiastical History," (5 vols., 1751–73,) and the "Life of Erasmus," (1758.) Died in 1770. "Jortin's sermons," says Dr. Johnson, "are very elegant."

Jo'seph, [Heb. יוֹסֵף; Gr. Ἰωσήφ; Lat. Jose'phus; It. Josef, yo-sĕf'; Sp. Josef, ho-sĕf',] one of the twelve patriarchs, and the favourite son of Jacob, was born in Mesopotamia about 1900 B.C. At an early age, on account of their jealousy, he was sold by his brothers to some Ishmaelitish merchants, who carried him as a slave into Egypt, over which kingdom he was subsequently appointed governor by Pharaoh. The descendants of his sons Ephraim and Manasseh formed the two half-tribes, which exerted no little influence in the Hebrew nation.

Joseph [Ger. pron. yo'sĕf] I., Emperor of Germany, of the house of Hapsburg, and son of Leopold I., was born in 1676. In 1687 he was proclaimed King of Hungary, and in 1690 King of the Romans. At the death of his father, in 1705, he ascended the imperial throne. He carried on a successful war against Louis XIV., in which he was assisted by England, Holland, and Savoy. The allied armies were commanded by Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough. Joseph granted, through the influence (it is said) of Charles XII. of Sweden, numerous privileges to his Protestant subjects. Died in 1711.

Joseph II., Emperor of Germany, the eldest son of Francis of Lorraine and Maria Theresa of Austria, was born in Vienna in 1741. In 1764 he was elected King of the Romans, and in the following year succeeded his father on the throne of Germany. He married Isabella, a daughter of the Duke of Parma, in 1760, and Maria Josepha, a daughter of the emperor Charles VII., about 1764. In 1772 he signed, with the sovereigns of Russia and Prussia, the treaty by which Poland was divided between them. At the death of his mother, in 1780, he came into possession of Hungary and all the other hereditary dominions of the house of Austria. He united with Catherine of Russia, six years later, in a Turkish war, in which his general Laudon gained several important victories. During his reign he introduced many civil and ecclesiastical reforms, which would probably have been very beneficial to his subjects had he acted with more calmness and deliberation. He abolished feudal serfdom, regulated the taxes, allowed liberty of conscience and rights of citizenship to all denominations of Christians, mitigated the condition of the Jews, suppressed several convents, greatly abridged the power of the pope and clergy in his dominions, and encouraged manufactures and industry. But his zeal in correcting the abuses of the Roman Church caused an insurrection in Belgium; while his attempt to establish the German as the universal language in his dominions induced the Hungarians to revolt. He died, without issue, in February, 1790, and was succeeded by his brother, Leopold II.

Joseph Emanuel, [Port. Jozé Manoel, zho-zā' mă-no-ĕl',] King of Portugal, born in 1714. In 1750 he succeeded his father, John V. In 1755 his kingdom suffered from a great earthquake, which destroyed a large part of Lisbon and killed about sixty thousand persons. In 1758 an attempt was made to assassinate him, in which he was severely wounded. He discovered that the Jesuits were implicated in the plot, and immediately caused all against whom any evidence was brought to be executed. He also issued an edict by which all the Jesuits in Portugal were declared traitors. In 1762 he united with England in a war against France and Spain. He enacted several laws to encourage education and to advance religious toleration, and restricted the powers of the Inquisition. Died in 1777.

Joséphine, jo'zẹ-feen', [Fr. pron. zho'zā'fēn',] originally Marie Joseph Rose Tascher de la Pagerie, (tă'shā' dẹh lă păzh're',) wife of Napoleon I. of France, was born in 1763 in the island of Martinique. At a very early age she attracted attention by her remarkable beauty and vivacity. About 1778 she went to reside in France with an aunt by whom she had been adopted, and thus became the heiress to a large fortune. She was soon after married to Viscount de Beauharnais, one of the most polished noblemen of the French court. In 1780 she gave birth to Eugene, who was subsequently appointed Viceroy of Italy by Bonaparte, and in 1783 to Hortense, afterwards Queen of Holland, and mother of Napoleon III. Jealousies having arisen between Beauharnais and his wife, the former sued for a divorce before the Parliament of Paris. The case was decided in favour of Josephine, who in a short time sailed for Martinique with her daughter. At this period her circumstances were so straitened that she was glad to accept from the captain of the vessel a pair of shoes for Hortense. At the expiration of three years she returned to France and was reconciled to her husband. During the French Revolution Beauharnais boldly opposed the measures of the Jacobins, by whom he was executed in 1794. His wife, who was then in prison, escaped the same fate only by the sudden fall of Robespierre. Through the influence of Barras and Tallien, she regained part of her husband's property, which had been confiscated. She now became one of the leaders of fashion. Her talents and personal attractions enabled her also to exert no little influence in the politics of that period. In 1796 she was married to Bonaparte, who had recently been appointed commander-in-chief of the army in Italy. At the time Josephine was thought by her friends to have formed a mésalliance. After Bonaparte became First Consul, she exerted all her influence to alleviate the sufferings of the royalists, and even endeavoured to persuade him to restore the Bourbons. While Napoleon was in Egypt, she had bought for her favourite resort the estate of Malmaison, which she fitted up with royal magnificence. At length her expenditures for this and other luxuries became so enormous as to occasion the First Consul serious embarrassment. When Napoleon was raised to the imperial throne and she became Empress of France, to her was due in a great measure the honour of having imparted to the court of the Tuileries the splendour and taste for which it was then distinguished. From the time of her coronation her influence over the emperor rapidly diminished; and, as there was no longer hope of her bringing him an heir, he finally resolved to divorce her. The announcement of this decision plunged the empress into the deepest despair. Napoleon himself is said to have been greatly affected; but his resolution was fixed, and the bill of divorce was passed in 1809. Josephine, still retaining her former dignities and titles, retired to Malmaison. Napoleon occasionally visited her, and appeared to cherish a sincere affection for her. When the allied armies invaded France, she was treated with the greatest respect by the emperor Alexander. She died in 1814, soon after the abdication of Napoleon. The character of Josephine has been greatly admired. The cause of this is to be attributed more to her pleasing manners than to any exalted virtue which she possessed. It is said that there was a fascination in her countenance which no painter could transfer to canvas. She had a very remarkable memory, was accomplished, educated, and witty; but vanity seems to have had an unlimited ascendency over her, and it does not appear that she was endowed with so many uncommon qualities as several modern writers have attributed to her. (See BONAPARTE, NAPOLEON.)

Josephson, yo'sĕf-sŏn, (LUDWIG,) a Swedish dramatist, born at Stockholm, of Jewish parents, February 20, 1830. Among his pieces are "Kunstens Vapen," "Kapten Gars," and "Thord Hasle," (1881.) He also prepared a history of the Swedish stage. His brother JAKOB (1818–80) was a noted composer of music.

Jo-se'phus, [Fr. JOSÈPHE, zho'zĕf'; It. GIOSEFFO, jo-sĕf'fo,] or, more fully, Flā'vĭ-us Jo-se'phus, [Gr. Φλάβιος Ἰώσηπος,] the most celebrated of Jewish historians, was born at Jerusalem A.D. 37. His mother was of the royal house of the Asmonæans, and his father belonged to the sacerdotal order from which the chief pontiffs were chosen. He pursued his studies in his native city with such assiduity that at the age of fourteen he was often consulted on abstruse points of Jewish law. He afterwards joined the sect of the Essenes, and passed three years with a hermit in the desert. At the age of nineteen he became a Pharisee. In the year 63 he visited Rome, in order to procure the liberation of some Jewish priests whom the governor Felix had sent there as prisoners. He was favourably received at the imperial court, and succeeded in his enterprise through the influence of Poppæa, the wife of Nero. On his return to Judea he opposed the revolutionary spirit that was then gaining ground among his countrymen. Perceiving his efforts to be of no avail, he accepted the government of the two Galilees, and in 67 A.D. bravely defended for forty-seven days the city of Jotapata against a powerful Roman army under Vespasian. The Romans finally triumphed, however, and of the Jewish warriors Josephus alone was saved, on account of his predicting that Vespasian would soon receive the imperial purple. He was treated with the greatest respect by Vespasian and Titus, and at the destruction of Jerusalem his influence procured the liberation of his brother and fifty of his friends. He afterwards accompanied Titus to Rome, where Vespasian granted him a pension and raised him to the rank of a Roman citizen. As a mark of gratitude for these and other favours, Josephus assumed the emperor's family name of Flavius. The date of his death is unknown; but some writers have placed it A.D. 95. The most important works of Josephus are his "History of the Jewish War," in seven books, "The Antiquities of the Jews," (Ἰουδαικὴ Ἀρχαιολογία,) in twenty books, two treatises "Against Apion of Alexandria," a "Discourse on the Martyrdom of the Maccabees," and an account of his own life. All of these were written in Greek, with the exception of the first, which was originally composed in Syro-Chaldaic and afterwards translated into Greek by himself. On account of the beauty of his style, he has been called "the Grecian Livy." His works have been translated into Latin and most of the modern languages of Europe.

Josh'u-a, [Heb. יְהוֹשֻׁעַ; Gr. Ἰησοῦς; Fr. JOSUÉ, zho'zü'ā',] or O'she-a, the son of Nun, (Numbers xiii. 16,) became commander of the Israelites on the death of Moses. He was distinguished for his bravery and military skill, and gained numerous important victories over the different Canaanite princes. Much controversy has arisen in regard to the authorship of the book of Joshua. Many suppose it to have been compiled from manuscripts written by himself; others attribute it to Samuel. Died about 1425 B.C.

Jo-sī'ah [Heb. יֹאשִׁיָּהוּ; Fr. JOSIAS, zho'se'âs'] succeeded his father Amon on the throne of Judah 641 B.C., at the age of eight years. He was an able and pious prince, and during his reign of thirty-one years many wise and beneficial laws were enacted: idolatry was suppressed, the Temple was repaired, and the true forms of worship were restored. He was killed in a battle against Pharaoh-Necho, King of Egypt, about 610 B.C.

Jötun, yö'tŭn, in the plural Jötuns, [an old Norse word signifying "giant," supposed to be derived from an ancient form of the verb to "eat," (Anglo-Saxon eoten,) the most prominent characteristic of the Jötuns being their prodigious voracity. (See Thorpe's "Northern Mythology," vol. i. p. 148,)] in the Norse mythology, the name applied to certain mythical beings supposed to be hostile to men and to the beneficent Æsir. The Jötuns, or Giants, are types of the disturbing, untamable, or destructive forces of nature. Hence the wolf Fenrir, (supposed to typify volcanic fire,) Midgard's Serpent, (the vast untamable ocean,) and Hela (the goddess of death) are all represented as of Jötun birth. Loki himself is considered to be of Jötun origin, and is the father of the mightiest and most terrible beings belonging to that race. Cold or frost, being one of the principal causes of desolation and death, is represented as the parent of a powerful family of Jötuns, termed Frost-giants. The abode of the Jötuns is called Jötunheim or Utgard, (oot'gârd, i.e. "outer ward,") and comprises the desert regions on the outermost boundary of the world. The Jötuns (i.e. the elements of disorder and desolation) are represented as being always at war with the Æsir, the powers presiding over life and order. (See ÆSIR.) The opposition is eternal; they are never reconciled, as in the case of the Vanir and Æsir, (see VANIR,) because there can be no reconciliation between order and confusion, or between life and death.

He soon after regained his liberty and returned to France, where he boldly opposed the Jacobins. In 1794 he received the appointment of adjutant-general, and in 1795, having displayed great bravery at Loano, he was raised to the rank of a brigadier-general on the field of battle. He subsequently gained distinguished honours at several battles in Italy and in the Tyrol. In 1799 he was appointed general-in-chief of the army in Italy, and fell at the battle of Novi, in August of that year. Jouffroi, de, dẹh zhoo'frwâ', [Lat. JOFFRE'DUS,] (JEAN,) a French prelate, born at Luxeuil about 1412. He obtained the favour of Louis XI., who procured for him a cardinal's hat in 1461, and made him his almoner. Died in 1473.

Jouffroy, zhoo'frwâ', (FRANÇOIS,) a French sculptor, born at Dijon in 1806. He gained the grand prize in 1832, and received a pension. He became a member of the Académie des Beaux-Arts in 1857. Died in 1882.

Jouffroy, (THÉODORE SIMON,) a French philosophical writer, born near Mouthe (Doubs) in 1796, was a pupil of Victor Cousin, who influenced the development and direction of his mind. He was appointed a tutor of philosophy (élève répétiteur) in the Normal School in 1817. This school having been suppressed in 1822, he began to write for several journals in Paris. In 1830 he became a professor in the Normal School, then re-established. He produced a version of the complete works of Thomas Reid, (6 vols., 1828–35.) In 1833 he was appointed professor of Greek and Latin philosophy in the Collége de France. He exchanged this position in 1838 for the office of librarian to the University, and succeeded Laromiguière as professor of philosophy in 1837. Among his works are "Mélanges philosophiques," (1833,) and "Cours d'Esthétique," (1843.) He also produced a version of Dugald Stewart's "Essays on Moral Philosophy," (1826,) to which he wrote a valuable preface. Died in 1842.

Jouffroy, de, dẹh zhoo'frwâ', (CLAUDE FRANÇOIS DOROTHÉE,) MARQUIS, an ingenious Frenchman, born in Franche-Comté, about 1750. He studied the construction of different vessels, and went to Paris, where he conceived the idea of propelling boats by steam. His first vessel of this kind was launched in 1776. Although this attempt was far from being successful, Jouffroy was convinced that his object was attainable. In 1783 he completed another steam-vessel, one hundred and forty feet long, with which he ascended the Saône several miles, but, on account of his limited means, was unable to carry his invention to a higher state of perfection. The inventions of Jouffroy were highly spoken of by Robert Fulton. Died in 1832.

Joule, jool, ? (JAMES P.,) F.R.S., an English experimental philosopher, born at Salford, near Manchester, in 1818. He was a pupil of the celebrated Dalton. He made some discoveries in electro-magnetism, and in the theory of heat. He is considered one of the founders of the theory of the correlation of forces. Died in 1889.

Jourdain, zhoor'dăn', (AMABLE LOUIS MARIE MICHEL Bréchillet—brā'she'yā',) a distinguished French writer and Orientalist, born in Paris in 1788. Among his principal works is "Persia; or, A Description of the History, Government, Religion, and Literature of that Empire," (5 vols., 1814.) He was a contributor to the "Biographie Universelle." Died in 1818.

Jourdain, (ANSELME LOUIS BERNARD Bréchillet,) an eminent surgeon-dentist, the father of the preceding, was born in Paris in 1734. He invented several instruments used by dentists, and wrote numerous treatises on dentistry. Died in 1816.

See J. R. DUVAL, "Notice historique sur la Vie de M. Jourdain," 1816.

Jourdain, (CHARLES MARIE GABRIEL Bréchillet,) a philosopher, a son of Amable, noticed above, was born in Paris in 1817. He published, besides other works, "La Philosophie de Saint Thomas d'Aquin," (2 vols., 1858.) Died July 20, 1886.

Jourdain, (CLAUDE,) a French Benedictine and antiquarian writer, born at Poligny in 1696; died in 1782.

Jourdan, zhoor'dŏn', (ANDRÉ JOSEPH,) a French statesman, born in Provence. In 1795 he was elected to the Council of Five Hundred, where he opposed the laws against the emigrants. For this reason, in 1797 he was obliged to seek an asylum in Spain. On the accession of Louis XVIII. Jourdan was chosen councillor of state. Died in 1831.

Jourdan, (ANTOINE JACQUES LOUIS,) born in Paris in 1788, published a "Dictionary of Terms used in the Natural Sciences," (2 vols., 1834.) Died in 1848.

Jourdan, (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a French dramatist, born at Marseilles in 1711; died in 1793.

Jourdan, (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a marshal of France, born at Limoges in 1762, was the son of a poor surgeon, who paid but little attention to his education. At the age of sixteen he entered the French army, and fought for the Americans in the Revolutionary war until 1782, when he returned home on account of ill health. In 1791 he again entered the army, and soon after received the command of a battalion, and served under La Fayette and Dumouriez. In 1793 he was appointed general of division. Having distinguished himself at the battle of Hondschoote, in 1793, he was chosen commander-in-chief of the French army. He then gained a decisive victory over the Austrians at Wattignies, near Maubeuge, and raised the siege of that town. He was subsequently called to Paris by the committee of public safety to consult upon the future movements of the army. He was at first received with great enthusiasm; but, having given offence by the candour with which he expressed his sentiments, he was deprived of his authority, and Pichegru was chosen in his place. In 1794, however, he was appointed commander of the army of the Moselle against the Austrians, over whom, in a few weeks, he won the important battles of Arlon and Fleurus. He also captured Charleroi and many other towns. In the autumn of 1794 he gained the victories of Ayvaile and Aldenhoven. He afterwards took Luxemburg, Dusseldorf, Frankfort, and Würzburg, but in September, 1796, was signally defeated by the Archduke Charles near the last-named place. Jourdan soon after resigned, and, having returned to Paris, was chosen a member of the Council of Five Hundred, of which a few months later he was elected president. In 1798 he was appointed to the command of the army on the Danube. In 1799, having met with two decisive defeats from the Archduke Charles, he was succeeded by Massena. The same year he was dismissed from the Council of Five Hundred for having opposed the ambitious projects of Napoleon. He was sent as ambassador to the Cisalpine Republic in 1800. Though created a marshal of the empire in 1804, no military command of importance was given to him until he accompanied Joseph Bonaparte to Spain as major-general. He remained with that monarch through all his vicissitudes, and was the nominal commander of the French forces when they were defeated at Vitoria by Wellington in 1813. In 1818 Louis XVIII. created Jourdan a peer of France. Died in 1833. He was the author of two works,—"Operations of the Army of the Danube under the Orders of General Jourdan," and "History of the Campaign of 1796, containing the Operations of the Army of the Sambre-et-Meuse." Napoleon, at Saint Helena, confessed that he had ill-treated Jourdan, whom he characterized as a "true patriot."

Jouvenet, zhoov'nā', (JEAN,) a celebrated historical painter, born at Rouen, France, about 1646. He was a pupil of his uncle, Laurent Jouvenet, and afterwards studied in Paris and was admitted into the Academy of Painting. He was subsequently patronized by Louis XIV., who granted him a pension of 1700 livres. Having lost the use of his right hand by a paralytic stroke, he ascertained that he could use his left with equal facility, and soon after painted one of his best pictures, a representation of Innocence followed by Falsehood and seeking protection in the arms of Justice. Among his other works are "Esther before Ahasuerus," "Jesus Christ driving the Money-Changers from the Temple," "The Resurrection of Lazarus," and the "Descent from the Cross."

Jouy, de, (VICTOR JOSEPH ÉTIENNE,) an eminent French writer, born at Jouy, near Versailles, in 1764 or 1769. He entered the army at an early age, and in 1790 favoured the Revolution; but during the reign of terror

he fled for safety to Switzerland. In 1794 he returned to France, and, after serving for some time in the army, which he quitted in 1797, fixed his residence in Paris and turned his attention to literary pursuits. Among his works are the operas of "The Vestal" (1807) and of "The Amazon," the tragedy of "Sylla," (1822,) "Cecil," a novel, (1827,) and a series of essays entitled "The Hermit of the Chaussée d'Antin," (5 vols., 1812–14.) The last work, which somewhat resembles Addison's "Spectator," obtained a European reputation. He was elected to the French Academy in 1815, and appointed chief librarian of the Louvre in 1831. Besides the works above named, he wrote "The Hermit in the Province," ("L'Hermite en Province," 14 vols., 1818 et seq.,) and "The Hermits in Prison," ("Les Hermites en Prison," 2 vols., 1823,) which was very popular. Died in 1846.

Jo′vĭ-an, [Lat. JOVIA′NUS; Fr. JOVIEN, zho′ve-ȧ̃n′; It. GIOVIANO, jo-ve-ä′no,] or, more fully, Jo-vĭ-ā′nus Flā′vĭ-us Clau′dĭ-us, Emperor of Rome, was born in Pannonia, 331 A.D. He early distinguished himself as a commander in the Roman army, and, though an avowed Christian, received many marks of distinction from Julian the Apostate, whom he accompanied on his unsuccessful expedition into Persia. At the death of that sovereign, in 363, Jovian was elected emperor by the army. The Roman troops were at that time in imminent danger, both on account of the superior Persian forces by which they were hemmed in, and the great scarcity of provisions. Jovian, after bravely repelling several attacks of the enemy, formed a treaty, by which he agreed to give up the Roman conquests west of the Tigris. Returning, he spent some time at Antioch, where he annulled Julian's laws against the Christians and re-established the orthodox religion. He died in 364, at Dadastana, in Galatia, as he was proceeding to Constantinople.

Juarez, joo-ā′rĕz, [Sp. pron. HOO-ā′rĕth,] (BENITO,) a Mexican statesman, born in Oajaca in 1806, and said to be of pure aboriginal stock. He studied law, was elected to Congress in 1846, and was Governor of Oajaca from 1848 to 1852. In 1853 he was banished by Santa Ana. He joined the party of Alvarez, who became president in 1855, and served under him as minister of justice. In 1857 he was appointed secretary of state by Comonfort, who was driven from power in January, 1858. Juarez was recognized as the successor of Comonfort by the Liberals, but was opposed by the clerical party in a long civil war. He was elected president about 1861, soon after which Mexico was invaded by a French army. Having gained several victories, the French took the city of Mexico in June, 1863, and Maximilian of Austria assumed the imperial power, under the patronage of Napoleon III. Juarez was reduced to a critical position, and his cause seemed desperate; but at length the French army was withdrawn in 1866, and the Liberals quickly recovered the ascendency. He was elected president again in October, 1867. Died July 18, 1872.

Ju′ba [Gr. Ἰόβας] I. succeeded his father, Hiempsal, on the throne of Numidia about 50 B.C. In the war between Cæsar and Pompey he supported the cause of the latter, and gained a decisive victory over Curio, a lieutenant of Cæsar. After Pompey's defeat at Pharsalia, Juba continued to support his cause in Africa, and for some time held even Cæsar in check. He was, however, defeated by the dictator at the battle of Thapsus, and soon after killed himself, 42 B.C., in preference to gracing the triumph of the conqueror. His kingdom was reduced to a Roman province, of which the historian Sallust was appointed the first governor.

Ju′das Le-vi′ta or Hal′le-vi, a learned Spanish Jew and poet, born in 1090 or 1080, wrote a work in Arabic in defence of the Jewish religion, entitled "Sepher Hoccori," which was translated into Hebrew, Latin, and Spanish. Died in 1140.

Ju′das Maccabæ′us, (mak-ka-bee′us,) [Gr. Ἰούδας ὁ Μακκαβαῖος; Fr. JUDAS MACHABÉE, zhü′dăs′ mă′kă′bā′,] of the royal line of the Asmonæans, became leader of the Jews upon the death of his father, Mattathias, B.C. 166. He conquered and cut in pieces several Syrian armies which had been sent against him by Antiochus, subdued the Idumeans, Ammonites, and other neighbouring nations, and restored the worship of the true God in the Temple of Jerusalem. He was afterwards besieged in that city by Antiochus Eupator, who was, however, soon obliged to return to Syria, on account of a civil war which had broken out in his kingdom. Judas, wishing to form an independent government in Judea, and being unable to contend against the whole power of Syria, concluded a treaty of alliance with the Romans. But, before any assistance could arrive, a large army of Syrians again invaded Judea. Judas marched against them with a body of three thousand men, which was soon reduced by desertion to eight hundred. He nevertheless attacked the enemy, and, after a severe battle, was defeated and slain, 160 B.C.

Judd, (JOHN WESLEY,) F.R.S., an English geologist, born at Portsmouth, February 18, 1840. He was educated at Westminster Normal College and the Royal School of Mines. In 1867 he went upon the geological survey, in 1876 he was appointed professor of geology in the Royal School of Mines, and in 1881 he took the geological professorship in the Normal School of Science, London. His best-known publication is "Volcanoes, What they Are, and What they Teach."

Judd, (ORANGE,) an American author and publisher, born near Niagara Falls, New York, July 26, 1822. He graduated at Wesleyan University in 1847, studied chemistry in Yale College, 1850–53, and edited the "American Agriculturist," 1853–81. His writings are chiefly on agricultural subjects. He liberally aided the Wesleyan University. Died December 27, 1892.

Judd, (SYLVESTER,) a Unitarian minister and writer, born in Westhampton, Massachusetts, in 1813. He graduated at Yale in 1836, studied divinity at Harvard, and from 1840 until his death, in 1853, was pastor of the Unitarian church in Augusta, Maine. His principal work, "Margaret, a Tale of the Real and Ideal," (1845,) is pronounced by the "North American Review" "the most emphatically American book ever written." It has since been beautifully illustrated by Darley. Among his other works are "Philio," a didactic poem.

Jude, [Gr. Ἰούδας,] SAINT, one of the twelve apostles. He is supposed to be the author of the book bearing his name. He was surnamed LEBBEUS and THADDEUS.

See Matthew x. 3; Mark iii. 18.

Judic, zhü'dĕk', (Madame ANNA DAMIENS,) a French actress, born at Semur, July 17, 1850. Bred a shop-girl, her strong passion for the stage procured her a place in the Conservatoire of Paris. She made her début at the Gymnase in 1867. Her best rôles are in light opera, where her grace and piquant style are very effective.

Judicael, ju'de-kāl, became ruler of Bretagne about 632, and assumed the title of royalty. After a reign of six years, he entered a monastery, and was succeeded by his son Alain.

Ju'dith, [Heb. יְהוּדִית; It. GIUDITTA, joo-dĕt'tȧ,] a Jewish heroine, of uncertain epoch. According to tradition, she lived at Bethulia when that town was besieged by Holofernes, a general of the King of Assyria. Having by insidious arts gained admission to his tent and persuaded him that she designed to betray the town to him, she cut off his head and carried it in a sack to Bethulia, which was, consequently, saved from capture.

Judith, zhü'dĕt', MADEMOISELLE, the stage name of JULIE Bernat, afterwards Madame BERNARD-DEROSNE, a French actress, born at Paris, of a Hebrew family, January 29, 1827. She was a relative of Mademoiselle Rachel, the tragédienne, and went upon the stage in 1842. Her beauty and native talents, however, failed at first to win much success; but in later years her power and versatility were widely recognized.

Jud'son, (ADONIRAM,) an eminent Baptist missionary, born in Malden, Massachusetts, in 1788, graduated at Brown University in 1807. He was sent as a missionary to Burmah in 1812, founded a mission at Rangoon, and learned the Burmese language. In 1823 he printed a Burmese translation of the New Testament. He was thrown into prison in 1824, and kept in close confinement eighteen months or more, during which he and his companions suffered extremely. He completed a Burmese translation of the Bible in 1834. He married successively Ann Hasseltine, Sarah Hall Boardman, and Emily Chubbuck, each of whom is noticed below. Having visited the United States in 1845, he returned to Burmah in 1846, and resumed his labours at Maulmain. He died at sea in April, 1850.

Judson, (ANN,) (originally Miss HASSELTINE,) a missionary to India, wife of the Rev. Dr. Adoniram Judson, was born in Bradford, Massachusetts, in 1789. (See preceding article.) A "Memoir of her Life," by the Rev. J. D. Knowles, appeared soon after her death in 1826.

Judson, (EMILY,) (originally Miss CHUBBUCK,) an American authoress, known by the nom de plume of "Fanny Forester," was born at Eaton, in New York, in 1817. She wrote for the "New York Mirror," and published two volumes of her essays, sketches, and poems, under the title of "Alderbrook," (1846.) She was married in 1846 to Dr. Judson, and immediately sailed with him for India. While in Burmah, she composed some of her best poems. After the death of her husband, in 1850, she returned to America, and died at Hamilton, New York, in 1854. (See JUDSON, ADONIRAM.)

Judson, (SARAH,) (originally Miss HALL,) a missionary to India, born in Alstead, New Hampshire, in 1803. In 1825 she was married to the Rev. George Dana Boardman, and the same year sailed with him for Burmah. They established the Baptist Mission at Maulmain, and subsequently at Tavoy. After the death of her husband, in 1831, she continued her missionary labours with great success. In 1834 she was married to Rev. A. Judson, noticed above. Died at Saint Helena in 1845.

Juel, yoo'ĕl, (J.,) a Danish admiral, was a brother of Niels, noticed below, with whom he co-operated in several battles. He was one of the negotiators of the treaty of Lund in 1679. Died about 1700.

See N. JONGE, "Vice-Admiral J. Juels Liv og Levnetsbeskrivelse," 1755.

Juel, (NIELS or NICHOLAS,) a celebrated Danish admiral, born in 1629. After serving in the Dutch navy under Van Tromp and De Ruyter, he entered the Danish service, and greatly distinguished himself by several important victories which he gained over the Swedes. The King of Denmark created him an admiral, knighted him, and conferred upon him other honours. Died in 1697.

Juengling, yĭng'ling, (FREDERICK,) a gifted artist-engraver, born in Leipsic in 1846, learned wood-engraving in his native city, and in 1866 came to New York, where, as accessory to his business of engraving, he studied drawing, painting, and etching. He was one of the founders of the American Society of Wood-Engravers. In 1883 one of his pictures was awarded a second-class medal at Munich. After a visit to Europe in search of health, he died in New York, December 31, 1889.

Juénin, zhü-ȧ'nȧn', (GASPARD,) a French priest, writer, and professor of philosophy in Paris, born at Varambon, in Bresse, in 1650; died in 1713.

Juglaris, yoo-glȧ'rès, (ALOISIO,) an Italian Jesuit and professor of rhetoric, born at Nice in 1607. He was also employed as preceptor to Prince Charles Emanuel of Savoy. He wrote numerous panegyrics on Louis XIII. and other persons of distinction. Died in 1653.

Jugleb, yōōg'lĕp, or Jugler, yōōg'lẹr, (JOHANN FRIEDRICH,) a German writer, born near Naumburg in 1718. He published "Biographical and Critical Notices of Eminent Jurists and Statesmen of Europe," (6 vols., 1773–80,) and other works. Died in 1791.

Ju-gur'tha, [Gr. Ἰουγούρθας or Ἰογόρθας,] an African prince, remarkable for his crimes and tragical death, was a natural son of Manastabal. He was brought up at the court of his uncle, Micipsa, King of Numidia, and at an early age served under Scipio Æmilianus in the Roman army. During the war with Numantia he gained great distinction, and at its conclusion was highly commended to his uncle by Scipio. Micipsa soon after created him joint heir with his own sons Adherbal and Hiempsal. Upon the death of that monarch, Jugurtha caused Hiempsal to be murdered, and forced Adherbal to seek protection at Rome. Commissioners were sent out by the Roman senate to divide the kingdom between Adherbal and Jugurtha; but the latter, having bribed them, received the largest portion of the territory, and was declared to be innocent of the murder of Hiempsal. Resolving, however, to obtain the entire kingdom, he captured Adherbal in the city of Cirta, while he was yet under the protection of the Roman senate, and put him to death with the greatest cruelty. War was immediately declared against him by the Romans; but he succeeded in forming an advantageous treaty with the consul Calpurnius, who had been sent to reduce him to subjection. The senate refused to ratify this treaty, and summoned Jugurtha to Rome to answer the charges brought against him. He obeyed the mandate; but while in that city he procured the assassination of his cousin Massiva, another claimant of the Numidian crown. Upon the commission of this outrage he was commanded to leave Rome. As he was taking his last view of the capital, he is said to have exclaimed, "Mercenary city, thou waitest only for a purchaser to sell thyself; and thou wilt perish if one is found." After his return to Numidia he defeated a Roman army under Aulus Posthumius, compelling it to pass under the yoke and to evacuate the country. The war was afterwards continued by Metellus; and, though Jugurtha was one of the ablest commanders of that age, he was unable to resist the Roman general, whose skill and prudence made him ever victorious on the field of battle, and whose stern integrity rendered him invincible to the golden offers of the Numidian usurper. Jugurtha, having been twice defeated by Marius, the successor of Metellus, was delivered to his enemies by the treachery of his ally, Bocchus, King of Mauritania. He was carried in chains to Rome, where he graced the triumph of Marius. He was then thrown into the Mamertine prison. His death, which occurred six days later, is generally supposed to have been caused by starvation. The Jugurthine war, which was terminated B.C. 106, is the subject of one of the histories of Sallust.

Jukes, jūks, (JOSEPH BEETE,) F.R.S., an English geologist, born near Birmingham about 1812. He published, besides other works, "Popular Physical Geology," (1853.) Died July 29, 1869.

Jules, the French for JULIUS, which see.

Jülg, yülG, (BERNHARD,) a German philologist, born at Ringelbach, Baden, August 20, 1825. He studied at Heidelberg and Berlin, and held professorships of classical philology in the Universities of Lemberg, Cracow, and Innspruck. His principal original investigations were in the Mongolian and other East-Asian languages. He published several volumes of "Mongolian Legends" with German translations. Died August 14, 1886.

Ju'lĭ-ą, [Fr. JULIE, zhü'le',] a Roman lady, remarkable for her beauty and virtues, was the daughter of Julius Cæsar. She first married Cornelius Cæpio, but, by her father's command, procured a divorce and became the wife of Pompey the Great. She died 53 B.C., before the dissensions arose between her father and her husband.

Julia, only daughter of Augustus Cæsar, born about 39 B.C., was distinguished for her beauty, accomplishments, and disgraceful intrigues. She was married to Marcellus, upon whose death she became the wife of Agrippa, by whom she was the mother of five children. After the death of her second husband she was given in marriage to Tiberius, who divorced her, and afterwards caused her to be poisoned, 14 A.D.

Julia, a daughter of the preceding, born about 18 B.C., was married to L. Æmilius Paulus. Her character is said to have resembled that of her mother. Some writers identify her with the Corinna of Ovid. Died 28 A.D.

Julia, a daughter of Drusus and Livia, born about 5 A.D., was a niece of Germanicus. She was married to Nero, who was her cousin-german.

Julia, daughter of Cæsar Germanicus, was born 17 A.D. At the age of sixteen she was married to a Roman senator named Vinucias. She was soon after suspected of conspiracy and banished by her brother Caligula, but was subsequently recalled by Claudius. She was put to death in her twenty-fourth year, at the instigation of Messalina.

Julia de Fontenelle, zhü'le-ȧ' dẹh fôN'tẹh-nĕl', (JEAN SÉBASTIEN EUGÈNE,) a French chemist, born at Narbonne in 1790, published a "Manual for Glass-makers," and other works. Died in 1842.

See HENRI JULIA DE FONTENELLE, "Notice sur M. Julia de Fontenelle," 1843.

Ju'lĭ-ą Dom'nạ, wife of the Roman emperor Septimius Severus, and the mother of Caracalla and Geta, was born in Syria about 170 A.D. She was the daughter of Bassianus, a priest of the sun. After the death of Severus she endeavoured to heal the dissensions between her sons, but in vain; Geta was murdered in her presence in 212, by his brother's orders. During the remainder of Caracalla's reign she exerted great influence in the affairs of government. Died in 217.

Ju'lĭ-an, [Lat. JULIA'NUS; Fr. JULIEN, zhü'le-ȧN',] or, more fully, Ju-lĭ-ā'nus Flā'vĭ-us Clau'dĭ-us, surnamed THE APOSTATE, a Roman emperor, was born in Constantinople in 331 A.D. He was the son of Julius Constantius, and a nephew of Constantine the Great. On the death of the latter, the soldiers, in order to secure the succession of his sons, massacred all the other members of the Flavian family except Julian and his elder brother Gallus. The jealousy of the emperor Constantius afterwards banished the brothers to Cappadocia, where they were educated in the principles of the Christian religion and officiated as lecturers in the church of Nicomedia. In 351 Gallus was created Cæsar by the emperor, and Julian was permitted to return to his native city, but in a short time was again exiled to Nicomedia. He subsequently embraced the philosophy of the Platonists, and, having obtained permission to visit Athens, he pursued his studies in that city and was privately initiated in the mysteries of the religion of Greece. After the execution of his brother, in 355, he was recalled to Constantinople through the influence of the empress Eusebia. Constantius created him Cæsar, and gave him command of the armies in Gaul. Julian also received in marriage Helena, sister of the emperor. He made four successful campaigns against the Germans, who had overrun Gaul, expelled them from that country, took captive Chnodomarius, their most powerful king, invaded Germany, and gained a high distinction for military skill and personal bravery. Constantius, envious of the fame of Julian, and wishing to destroy his power, commanded him to send his best troops to the East, in order that they might assist in the Persian war. The soldiers, who had become greatly attached to Julian, refused to obey, and, notwithstanding his remonstrances, proclaimed him Augustus. It is even stated that they threatened him with death if he refused the purple. He then sent an embassy to Constantius, requesting that he might be recognized as Augustus in Gaul. This not having been granted, he marched towards Constantinople; but the sudden death of the emperor, in 361, enabled Julian to ascend the imperial throne unopposed. Immediately after his accession he threw off the hypocrisy which had shielded him for so long a time, and, renouncing Christianity, in which probably he was never a true believer, declared his faith in the divinities of Greece and Rome. He proclaimed liberty of conscience to all, commanded the pagan temples to be reopened, and even attempted to restore Judaism by rebuilding the Temple at Jerusalem. He was prevented from completing this project by remarkable eruptions of fire, which rendered it impossible for the workmen to continue their labours. In the spring of 363 he set out from Antioch, at the head of 65,000 well-disciplined troops, on his contemplated invasion of Persia. He crossed the Euphrates and Tigris, and gained several important victories over the Persians; but the oppressive heat and the scarcity of provisions compelled him to retreat, and in June of the same year, as he was bravely repelling an attack of the enemy, a javelin wounded him fatally in the side. He died the following evening, while he was calmly conversing with his friends on philosophy. Julian was the author of an account of his Gallic and German wars, which has been lost, "The Cæsars," "Misopogon," a satire against the citizens of Antioch, whom he had offended by his philosophical austerity and his slovenly habits, and of about eighty letters upon various subjects.

Ju'lĭ-an, [Lat. JULIA'NUS; Fr. JULIEN, zhü'le-ân'; It. GIULIANO, joo-le-â'no,] an Italian bishop, distinguished for his opposition to the doctrines of Saint Augustine, was born about 380, and studied theology under Pelagius. In 416 Innocent I. raised him to the see of Eclanum; but about 420 he was banished from Italy on account of his Pelagian doctrines. Having been condemned by several councils, he settled in Sicily. Died about 455.

Julian, Archbishop of Toledo, and a saint of the Roman calendar, was born in Spain, of Jewish descent. He was raised to the see of Toledo in 680, and presided over four different councils held in that city. He was the author of a work on death, the resurrection, and the final judgment. Died in 690.

Julien, the French for JULIAN, which see.

Julien, zhü'le-ân', (PIERRE,) a celebrated French sculptor, born at Saint-Paulien in 1731. He commenced his studies at Lyons, under Pérache, whom he left in 1765 to become the pupil of Coustou, the king's sculptor, at Paris. In 1768 he went to Rome, where he remained four years, to perfect himself in his art. In 1779 his statue of "The Dying Warrior" gained his admission to the Academy of Painting and Sculpture in Paris. Died in 1804. Among his most admirable productions are "La Baigneuse," the statues of La Fontaine and Poussin, and copies of Apollo Belvedere and "The Dying Gladiator," from the Italian.

See J. LEBRETON, "Notice historique sur la Vie et les Ouvrages de P. Julien," 1805.

Julien, (SIMON,) or Julien of Parma, a French artist, born at Toulon in 1736, studied in Paris under Vanloo, resided ten years at Rome, and after his return was elected a member of the Academy of Painting. He was called JULIEN THE APOSTATE, because he abandoned the French style. Died in 1800.

Julien, (STANISLAS,) an eminent French Orientalist, born at Orleans in 1799. He studied under Abel Rémusat, and devoted himself particularly to the Chinese language. He succeeded Abel Rémusat as professor of Chinese in 1832, and afterwards became administrator, in the College of France. He made translations from Mengtseu (Mencius) and other Chinese authors, and published "Practical Exercises of Chinese Syntax and Lexicography," (1842.) Julian's reputation is that of one of the first Chinese scholars of his time. He was a member of the Academy of Inscriptions, and of the principal learned societies of Europe. Among his works is one of great interest, "Voyages des Pèlerins Bouddhistes," (3 vols., 1853–58,) translated from the Chinese. Died at Paris, February 13, 1873.

Julio Romano. See GIULIO ROMANO.

Julius [Fr. JULES, zhül; It. GIULIO, joo'le-o] I., a Roman by birth, succeeded Marcus in the papal see in 336. In 340 he convoked a council at Rome to settle the dispute between Athanasius, the orthodox Bishop of Alexandria, and the Arians, who had expelled him from his office. Athanasius appeared; but his enemies called at Antioch a council which condemned him. Julius, finding his interpositions to be in vain, summoned the General Council of Sardica, which restored the bishop to his see and introduced the custom of appealing to the pope in all ecclesiastical disputes. Died in 352 A.D.

Julius II., (Cardinal GIULIANO della Rovere—del'lâ ro-vā'rà,) born in 1441, was elected to the see of Rome upon the death of Pius III., in 1503. Haughty and warlike in his disposition, he immediately turned his ambition to the aggrandizement of the papal authority. He drove Cæsar Borgia from the Romagna, and attempted to expel the Venetians from Ravenna, Rimini, and other parts of his dominions. Failing in this, he formed the League of Cambrai with the King of France, the Emperor of Germany, and the Duke of Ferrara, for the destruction of the Venetian republic. Julius, soon discovering, however, that he had more to fear from the French than from the Venetians, made a treaty with the latter in 1510, and took the field in person against the French, over whom he gained some slight advantages. In 1512 he allied himself with the English, Spaniards, Swiss, and Venetians, and finally succeeded in expelling the French from Italy. But little was gained by this success, for the Swiss and Spaniards gave him as much trouble as the French had previously done. He died before these new difficulties were adjusted, in 1513. Julius displayed a great taste for the fine arts. He was the first to commence Saint Peter's Cathedral at Rome, and was the patron of Michael Angelo, Raphael, and other men of distinction. Leo X. was his successor.

Jung, yōōng, or Junge, yōōng'ẹh, [Lat. JUNG'IUS,] (JOACHIM,) a German physician and botanist, born at Lubeck in 1587, became successively professor of mathematics at Giessen and Rostock. He was one of the most able opponents of the scholastic philosophy, and for his acuteness was compared by Leibnitz to Copernicus and Galileo. He also, it is said, first suggested, in his "Isagoge Phytoscopica," (1678,) the classification of plants afterwards developed by Linnæus. He was rector of a school at Hamburg from 1629 until his death. Died at Hamburg in 1657.

Jung, (JOHANN HEINRICH,) commonly known by the pseudonym of STILLING, an original German writer, born at Im-Grund, in the duchy of Nassau, in 1740. While studying medicine at Strasburg, he formed an intimacy with Goethe, who has given an interesting account of him in his Autobiography. In 1804 he became professor of political economy at Heidelberg. He published in 1777 "Henry Stilling's Youth, Early Years, and Wanderings," which was followed soon after by "Henry Stilling's Domestic Life." Among his fictitious writings we may cite "Theobald, or the Enthusiast," "The Christian Philanthropist," and "Scenes from the Spirit-Land." Stilling appears to have been a man of great earnestness as well as simplicity of character, with a strong tendency to religious enthusiasm and mysticism. Died in 1817.

Jung-Bahâdoor, (or -Bahâdur,) jŭng (or jŭng) bahă'dōōr, (i.e. "brave in war,") [from the Hindostanee jung, "battle," "war," and bahâdur or bahadoor, "brave,"] the name, or rather surname, of several Indian princes, among whom the recent minister of Nepaul and virtual sovereign of that country deserves particular mention. He was the son of a Nepaulese general, was born about 1815, and by his unscrupulous audacity, combined with rare talents for intrigue, he soon raised himself to the highest position in the state. About 1850 he visited England as ambassador, and while in that country was the object of much attention. In 1857 he offered the English government his co-operation in suppressing the mutiny of the Sepoys, and, with about 9000 Goorkhas, (a race of probable Aryan origin,) took part in the capture of Lucknow, for which, and other services, he received the grand cross of the Bath. Died February 25, 1877.

Junger, yōōng'ẹr, (ÆGIDIUS,) D.D., a bishop, born at Burtscheid, in Rhenish Prussia, April 6, 1833. He was educated at Aix-la-Chapelle and at Louvain, and was for many years a Roman Catholic priest in Washington Territory. In 1879 he was consecrated Bishop of Nesqually in that Territory.

Junger, yōōng'ẹr, (JOHANN FRIEDRICH,) a German littérateur, born at Leipsic in 1759. He was the author of numerous popular romances and dramatic works. Among his novels are "Vetter Jakobs Launen," (6 vols., 1786–92,) and "Der Schein trügt," (1787.) Died in 1797.

Jungermann, yōōng'ẹr-măn', (GOTTFRIED,) a German philologist, born at Leipsic. He published "Longi Pastoralia Græce cum Latina Versione," (1605,) and other classical works. Died in 1610.

Jungermann, (LUDWIG,) a botanist, born at Leipsic in 1572, was a brother of the preceding. He was professor of botany at Altdorf. Died in 1653.

Junghans, yōōng'hăns, (SOPHIE,) a German novelist, born at Cassel, December 3, 1845. In 1877 she married Professor Joseph Schumann, but retained her maiden name for her literary work. Her writings include "Käthe," (1876,) "Haus Eckberg," (1878,) and other novels, marked by masculine force in style and in characters.

Junghuhn, yōōng'hōōn, (FRANZ WILHELM,) a Prussian naturalist, born at Mansfeld in 1812. He was employed as army physician or officer of health in India, and explored the island of Java. He published, besides other works, an account of the topography, botany, and geology of Java, ("Java, seine Gestalt, Pflanzendecke und innere Bauart," 3 vols., 1852,) which is esteemed the best work on that subject. Died April 24, 1864.

Jungmann, yōōng'măn, (JOSEPH JAKOB,) a learned Slavonian philologist, born at Hudlitz, in Bohemia, in 1773. He was appointed in 1815 professor of languages and rhetoric at the Gymnasium of Prague, where he was afterwards prefect. His greatest work is a "Bohemian-German Dictionary," (5 vols., 1835,) which gives evidence of immense learning and industry. He also wrote a "History of the Bohemian Language and Literature," (1825,) and a "Bohemian Chrestomathy." He wrote other works, in prose and verse, and made a number of translations from eminent English and French writers. Jungmann is regarded as one of the most zealous and efficient promoters of Slavonian literature. Died in 1847.

Ju-nil'ĭ-us, a bishop who flourished in Africa about 550 A.D. He wrote a Latin work "On Parts of the Divine Law," which was printed at Bâle in 1545.

Ju'nĭ-us, the assumed name of a political writer who in January, 1769, began to issue, in London, a series of famous letters, which first appeared in Woodfall's "Public Advertiser." Junius opposed the ministry then in power, and denounced several eminent persons with great severity of invective and pungency of sarcasm. His style is eminently pure, terse, and vigorous. These letters had a great popularity, and powerfully promoted the cause of civil liberty. "The myrmidons of the court," said Burke, in the House of Commons, "have been long, and are still, pursuing him in vain. They will not spend their time upon me, or you, or you. No: they disdain such vermin when the mighty boar of the forest, that has broken through all their toils, is before them. . . . Kings, Lords, and Commons are but the sport of his fury. Were he a member of this House, what might not be expected from his knowledge, his firmness and integrity!" Among the numerous persons to whom these letters have been attributed were Sir Philip Francis, Lord Chatham, Edmund Burke, Henry Grattan, Colonel Barré, Gibbon the historian, John Horne Tooke, Horace Walpole, John Wilkes, and Wedderburn, (afterwards Lord Loughborough.) The publication of the Letters of Junius continued until January, 1772. In his dedication to the people of England, he said, "I am the sole depositary of my own secret, and it shall perish with me."

A multitude of books and essays have been written in the attempt to solve this mystery. But all the efforts in that direction seemed for a long time to be wholly unsuccessful; so much so that a very able lawyer and antiquary, Sir N. H. Nicolas, writing in 1843, declared his conviction that all the Junius-seekers had completely failed in their undertaking. Macaulay, however, in his essay on Warren Hastings, (1841,) says that "the evidence [against Sir P. Francis] would support a verdict in a civil—nay, in a criminal—proceeding." At the present time (1885) the question is still doubtful. A great number of circumstances seem to point to Sir Philip Francis as the true Junius. Among the various incidental proofs bearing on this question, one of the most curious is given in "Lippincott's Magazine" for January, 1870. But Abraham Hayward has since then adduced strong reasons for rejecting the Francis theory.

Ju'nĭ-us, (FRANCIS,) [Fr. FRANÇOIS DU JON, frŏN'-swȧ' dü zhŏN,] a learned Protestant theologian, was born at Bourges, in France, May 1, 1545. He studied at Lyons and Geneva, and was appointed pastor of a Walloon church in Antwerp in 1565, but at length was compelled to fly to Germany to escape the tortures of the Inquisition. In 1568 he became chaplain to the army of the Prince of Orange. Five years later, at the request of the Elector-Palatine, he went to Heidelberg, where, with the assistance of Tremellius, he translated the Old Testament into Latin, (1575–79.) This work, which established his reputation, is known as the version of Junius and Tremellius. He afterwards filled successively the chairs of theology at Neustadt, Heidelberg, and Leyden. He wrote numerous works on divinity and the classics. Died at Leyden in October, 1602.

Junius, (FRANCIS or FRANCISCUS,) an eminent philologist, son of the preceding, was born at Heidelberg in 1589, and was educated at Leyden. He passed over to England about 1620, and became librarian to Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel, with whom he remained thirty years. He devoted his attention chiefly to the study of the Teutonic languages. He published a rare and valuable work,—a translation of the Gospels into the ancient Gothic, (made by Bishop Ulphilas about 360 A.D.,) with a Commentary, (1665.) Junius was the author of a work "On the Painting of the Ancients," ("De Pictura Veterum," 1637,) and of an Etymological Dictionary, ("Etymologicum Anglicanum," 1743,) in which he explains the derivation and origin of numerous English words. He left his choice collection of manuscripts to the University of Oxford. Died at Windsor in 1677.

Junius, de, dẹh yoo'ne-us, or Jonghe, yong'ẹh, (ADRIAAN,) a learned Dutch physician, was born at Hoorn, in Friesland, in 1512. He went to England near the close of the reign of Henry VIII., and became physician to the Duke of Norfolk. After the accession of Edward VI. he published a Greek-and-Latin Lexicon, which he dedicated to that sovereign. For this he was severely censured by the Roman pontiff. He wrote in honour of the marriage of Queen Mary with Philip of Spain a Latin poem entitled "Philippeis." About 1564 he was appointed physician to the King of Denmark. Died at Middelburg in 1575. As a philologist and linguist his contemporaries regarded him as second only to Erasmus. In addition to the works previously mentioned are his "Nomenclature of All Things," a vocabulary in seven different languages, several Latin poems and epistles, and various commentaries on the writings of the ancient authors.

Junker, yo͝onk'ẹr, or Juniker, yoo'ne-kẹr, (GEORG ADAM,) a teacher and translator, born at Hanau about 1720. He translated numerous German dramas, etc. into French. Died in 1805.

Junker, (WILHELM JOHANN,) a traveller, born at Moscow, Russia, April 6, 1840. He studied medicine at Göttingen, Berlin, and Prague. He travelled extensively in Tunis, (1874 et seq.,) Egypt, the Upper Nile Valley, and Central Africa. Died February 13, 1892.

Junkermann, yo͝onk'ẹr-mȧn', (AUGUST,) a very popular German comic actor, born at Bielefeld, December 15, 1832. He is best known for his renderings of various characters in Fritz Reuter's works, which have been dramatized for him, and, in part, by himself. He has played chiefly in Treves and Stuttgart.

Junk'in, (GEORGE,) D.D., LL.D., an American Presbyterian divine, born at New Kingston, Pennsylvania, November 1, 1790. He graduated at Jefferson College (in Western Pennsylvania) in 1813, and was ordained in 1819, was made president of Lafayette College in 1832, was president of Miami University from 1841 to 1844, and of Washington College, Lexington, Virginia, from 1848 to 1861. In his numerous published works he was an active defender of the Old School theology. Died in Philadelphia, May 20, 1868.

Ju'no, [Fr. JUNON, zhü'nôN'; It. GIUNONE, joo-no'-nȧ,] a goddess of the Roman mythology, called the queen of heaven and the wife of Jupiter, corresponding to the Greek Hera, (Ἥρα or Ἥρη.) She was regarded as the protecting deity of the female sex, and as the patroness of marriage and maternity. She was surnamed MATRONA and REGINA, and was worshipped by the Roman women at an annual festival called Matronalia. As the patroness of marriage, she was called Pronuba, Gamelia, Jugalis or Juga, and various other names. Her aid was implored by women in childbirth under the name of LUCINA, (which see.) She is usually represented as a majestic woman, crowned, with her favourite bird, the peacock, near her. The name Juno is in all probability related etymologically to the Sanscrit word Yŏnĭ,* signifying "matrix," and hence denoting maternity and femineity.

See SMITH, "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology;" KEIGHTLEY, "Mythology," article "Hera;" GUIGNIAUT, "Religions de l'Antiquité," vol. ii. chap. ii.

Junon. See JUNO.

* It is scarcely necessary to remind the etymologist how nearly u is related to o: in Arabic and Persian they have but a single letter to represent both; in Norwegian and Swedish there is but little difference in the pronunciation of the two vowels, o being pronounced precisely like the Italian or German u. J (i.e., i consonant) in the Latin Y. The terminal o in Juno is merely the feminine termination so common in Greek and Latin proper names.

Junot, zhü'no', (ANDOCHE,) Duc d'Abrantès, a distinguished French general, was born near Semur in 1771. At the age of twenty he enlisted as a common soldier, but, on account of his uncommon bravery, was soon made lieutenant. While serving at the siege of Toulon, he gained the approbation of Bonaparte, who made him his first aide-de-camp, with the rank of captain. He accompanied that general on his Italian campaigns, and fought with his accustomed bravery at the battles of Lodi, Arcola, Castiglione, and Lonato. During the invasion of Egypt and Syria he became the favourite of Bonaparte, and gained great distinction at the battle of Nazareth, where, with three hundred horsemen, he attacked and held in check a body of three thousand Moslems. After his return to France he rendered efficient service to Bonaparte in the subversion of the Directory. In 1800 he was appointed commandant of Paris, and afterwards governor of that city and colonel-general of hussars. He also received the decoration of the grand eagle of the legion of honour, and was sent as ambassador to Portugal. He took part in the battle of Austerlitz, in 1805. In 1807 he commanded an army which invaded Portugal and took Lisbon. He was soon afterwards created Duc d'Abrantès. In August, 1808, he was defeated by Sir Arthur Wellesley at Vimiera, and compelled to evacuate Portugal. The emperor then deprived him of the governorship of Paris, but appointed him Captain-General and Governor of the Illyrian provinces. His misfortunes and disgrace shortly after affected his mind so deeply that he was obliged to retire from public life. He died at Montbard in July, 1813.

Junot, (LAURE PERMON,) MADAME, Duchesse d'Abrantès, was born in Montpellier in 1784, and was married to General Junot about 1800. Her family was related to that of Bonaparte, to whom her mother had shown great kindness before he became a general. At her marriage Mademoiselle Permon received from the First Consul one hundred thousand francs as a marriage-portion. In 1806 she accompanied her husband to Lisbon, and in 1807 became Duchesse d'Abrantès. On the restoration of the Bourbons she was kindly received by Louis XVIII. She wrote, besides other works, "Memoirs or Historical Souvenirs of Napoleon, the Revolution, the Directory, etc.," (18 vols., 1831–34.) Died in 1838.

Junterbuck, yo͝on'tẹr-bo͝ok', (JAMES,) a Polish writer, and professor of theology at Erfurt, was born about 1385; died in 1465. He wrote various works, among which is a "Tract on Mental Apparitions."

Ju'pĭ-tẹr or Jup'pĭ-tẹr, [Fr. pron. zhü'pe'taiR'; It. GIOVE, jo'vȧ, whence the English JOVE,*] the supreme deity of the Roman mythology, corresponding to the Greek ZEUS, and represented as the eldest son of Saturn and Rhea. He was the greatest of all the gods of the classic mythology, and was supposed to control all earthly and human affairs and to foresee futurity. The Romans ascribed to him power over all changes in the sky, and the phenomena of rain and lightning, and hence applied to him the epithets of "Pluvius," ("rainy," or "raining,") "Tonans," ("thundering,") "Fulminator," ("thunderer,") etc. As presiding over marriage, he is sometimes called Gamelius; and as the protector of the rights of hospitality, he was invoked as Jupiter Hospitalis. He was sometimes called Jupiter Capitolinus, because his temple at Rome stood on the Capitol. He was the father of Apollo, Mars, Mercury, Minerva, Venus, etc. According to the Greek mythology, he kept his court on Olympus. His most famous Greek temple was at Olympia, in Elis. He is usually represented as seated on a throne, with a thunderbolt in his right hand, in his left a sceptre, and near him his favourite bird the eagle. The name Jupiter (who was also called Diespiter) is probably Diu-pater, (or Diovis pater,) ("father of the heavens," or "heavenly father.") Dium, Divum, and Dies originally signified the same,—viz., the "sky" or "heaven." The Vedic dyaus pitar, and the Greek Zeus Pater or Zeu Pater, (i.e. "father Zeus,") are etymologically the same as Jupiter. Respecting the probable identity, or close parallelism, between Jupiter (or Zeus) and the Hindoo god Siva, see SIVA.

Juppin, zhü'pȧN', (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a Flemish landscape-painter, born at Namur in 1678. He studied in Brussels, and afterwards visited Italy. Among his works is the "Crater of Vesuvius." Died in 1729.

Juret, zhü'rȧ', (FRANÇOIS,) a French critic and poet, born at Dijon in 1553, became canon of Langres. He published "Senecæ ad Lucilium Epistolarum Liber," (1602,) and "Panegyrici Veteres cum Notis," (2 vols., 1652.) Died in 1626.

Jurieu, zhü're͡-u͡h', (PIERRE,) a learned French theologian and controversialist, was born at Mer, in Orléanais, in 1637. He became pastor of a Protestant congregation in Mer after he had studied at Saumur and Sedan. He was subsequently appointed professor of theology and Hebrew at Sedan. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, in 1685, he retired to Rotterdam, where he was appointed professor of theology. He wrote numerous religious works, among which are a "History of Calvinism and Popery compared," (1682,) and a "Critical History of Doctrine and Worship, Good and Bad," (1704,) both in French. Died in 1713.

Ju'rin, (JAMES,) an English physician and philosopher, was born in 1684, and was educated at Cambridge. He was elected a member of the Royal Society, of which he became secretary, and was chosen president of the College of Physicians. He wrote several treatises on philosophy and physiology. Died in 1750.

Jurine, zhü'rẹn', (LOUIS,) a Swiss physician and naturalist, born at Geneva in 1751, resided in Paris. He wrote, besides other works, a treatise on ascertaining the salubrity of the atmosphere. Died in 1819.

Jussieu, jŭs-sü', de, [French pron. dẹh zhü'se͡-u͡h',] (ADRIEN,) a celebrated French botanist, son of Antoine Laurent, noticed below, was born in Paris, December 23, 1797. He gained the first prize at the competition of 1814, and applied himself to the study of natural history and medicine. He succeeded his father as professor of rural botany in the Museum of Natural History in 1826, and was admitted to the Institute in 1831. He published a series of memoirs and monographs which have placed him in the first rank of botanists. Among his best works are a "Monograph of the Malpighiaceæ," (1843,) and an "Elementary Course of Botany," which has been translated into all the languages of Europe. In 1845 he became professor of vegetable organography to the Faculté des Sciences. Died in June, 1853.

Jussieu, de, (ALEXIS,) a French journalist and administrator, born in 1797, was a nephew of the great botanist Antoine Laurent. He was prefect of Ain and of Vienne in the reign of Louis Philippe. Died in 1865.

Jussieu, de, (ANTOINE,) professor of botany in the Royal Garden of Paris, was born at Lyons in 1686. He travelled in France, Spain, and Italy for the purpose of making botanical explorations, succeeded Tournefort as professor of botany in 1708, and was the author of several treatises on that science. He published a new edition of Tournefort's "Institutions." Died in 1758.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Jussieu, de, (ANTOINE LAURENT,) a celebrated French botanist, born at Lyons in April, 1748, was the most eminent member of a family which has been called "the Botanical Dynasty." In 1765 he went to Paris to study medicine, and became the protégé and pupil of his uncle, Bernard de Jussieu, who lectured on botany in the Jardin du Roi, and was meditating a natural method of classification, near the close of a life memorable in the records of botanical science. This uncle, whose advanced age and dimness of sight indisposed him to the labours of authorship, freely communicated his mature reflections to young Jussieu, who zealously enlisted in the important enterprise. In 1770, having just graduated as M.D., he was appointed demonstrator of botany in the Jardin du Roi, as the substitute of Lemonnier, chief physician to the king. His first production was an excellent monograph on the "Ranunculaceæ," (1774,) which opened to him the Academy of Sciences and determined him to apply himself almost exclusively to botany.

* Or, to speak more accurately, both the Italian and English are derived from Jovis, the Latin genitive case of Jupiter. The German, Spanish, and Portuguese names for Jupiter, in spelling and accentuation, are the same as the Latin.

In 1774 the arrangement of the plants in the Royal Garden, which was conformed to the system of Tournefort, was exchanged for one proposed by Jussieu, founded on natural affinities. While performing his duties as professor, he continued to digest and perfect his new system, until 1788, when he developed the same in his great Latin work, "Genera Plantarum secundum Ordines naturales disposita," "which," says Cuvier, "forms in the sciences of observation an epoch perhaps as important as the 'Chemistry' of Lavoisier in the sciences of experiment." Although the success of his book was retarded by the political convulsions of France, his philosophical system has gradually prevailed and superseded the artificial method of Linnæus. The idea of such a system had occurred to other botanists; but Jussieu is entitled to the honour of laying its broad and impregnable foundations.

In 1793 the school of the Royal Garden was reorganized, under the title of "Muséum of Natural History," and the chair of botany was given to Jussieu, who was also chosen director of the institution. A few years later he became a member of the Institute, and in 1808 was appointed a councillor of the Imperial University. At the restoration of the Bourbons he lost the office last named, but retained the professorship until 1826, when he resigned it in favour of his son. Between 1800 and 1820 he wrote many botanical treatises on natural orders and families, which were inserted in the records of the Institute or the "Annales du Muséum." These are characterized by the same merits as his principal work, —profound knowledge, patient observation, a correct estimate of the value of characters, and an admirable sagacity in perceiving affinities. Died in 1836.

Jussieu, de, (BERNARD,) a celebrated botanist, brother of Antoine, noticed above, was born at Lyons in 1699. After studying in his native city, he accompanied his brother on several scientific tours. On returning to France he entered the medical course at Montpellier, where he graduated in 1720. Six years later he was chosen Doctor of the Faculty of Medicine at Paris. He was the first to conceive the idea of the classification of plants according to their affinities. This method was perfected by his nephew, the celebrated Antoine Laurent de Jussieu. He was held in high esteem by Louis XV., to whom he gave valuable advice upon the formation of the garden at Trianon. Jussieu visited England, and was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society. Died in 1777.

See CONDORCET, "Éloge de Jussieu;" "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Jussieu, de, (JOSEPH,) brother of Antoine and Bernard de Jussieu, was born in Lyons in 1704. In 1735 he accompanied, as a botanist, the French and Spanish savants who had been sent by their respective governments to Peru. He remained in that country and other parts of South America until 1771, and collected valuable information on natural history. Died at Paris in 1779.

Jussieu, de, (LAURENT PIERRE,) a French moralist and writer, born at Lyons in 1792, was a brother of Alexis, noticed above. He wrote a number of popular educational works, among which are "Simon de Nantua," (1818,) and "Antoine et Maurice," (1821.) His "Posthumous Works of Simon de Nantua" (1829) obtained the Montyon prize. Died February 23, 1866.

Jus'tin, [Lat. JUSTI'NUS, or JUSTI'NUS FRONTI'NUS,] a Latin historian of uncertain period, and of whose life nothing is known. He wrote a work entitled "Historiarum Philippicarum Libri XLIV.," which, as he informs the reader in his preface, is extracted or abridged from the History of the World written by Trogus Pompeius. As the original work is lost, Justin's history, although it has no great intrinsic merit except an elegant style, supplies much valuable information not found in other histories. The most ancient writer that mentions Justin is Saint Jerome; and it is supposed that the former lived between 150 and 350 A.D.

Jus'tin or Justi'nus, surnamed THE MARTYR, one of the earliest and most learned of the Christian fathers, was born of Greek parentage at Neapolis, in Palestine, about 103 A.D. He was educated in the pagan religion and in the philosophy of Plato. About 132 he embraced Christianity. He afterwards removed to Rome, where he wrote, in Greek, his first apology for the Christian religion. It was addressed to the emperor Antoninus, from whom Justin procured some concessions for the Christians. His other apology was addressed to Marcus Aurelius. He also wrote an account of his discussions with Trypho, a learned Jew, upon the Messiah. He suffered martyrdom at Rome under Marcus Aurelius, for refusing to sacrifice to the heathen gods, about 165. His writings are considered very valuable.

Justin or Justinus I., Emperor of the East, was born a peasant in Dacia in 450 A.D. At an early age he went to Constantinople, where he enlisted in the imperial guards of Leo I. He distinguished himself by his military abilities, and rose in rank until he was successively appointed general and commander of the guards. In 518, on the death of the emperor Anastasius, Justin was proclaimed his successor by the soldiers and the people. Through his instrumentality the Greek and Roman Churches were reconciled. He is generally regarded as a just prince. Died in 527, soon after resigning the throne to his nephew Justinian.

Justin or Justinus II. was a nephew of Justinian I., whom he succeeded as Emperor of Constantinople in 565. During his reign the Longobards under Alboin invaded Italy, the northern part of which they wrested from the Eastern Empire, and the Persians made several important conquests in the Asiatic provinces. In 574, perceiving his inability to govern, he resigned in favour of Tiberius, the captain of his guards. Died in 578.

Jus-tī'na, [Fr. JUSTINE, zhüs'tèn',] SAINT, a Christian martyr, who is supposed to have suffered death under Diocletian, (A.D. 304.) She was the patroness of Venice and of Padua. In the latter town a church was built in her honour in the fifth century.

See MRS. JAMESON, "History of Sacred and Legendary Art."

Jus-tin'ĭ-an or Jus-tin-ĭ-ā'nus [Fr. JUSTINIEN, zhüs'te'ne-âN'] I., one of the most celebrated of the Emperors of the East, and nephew of Justin I., was born in Dardania, May 11, 483 A.D. Justin at his coronation in 518 appointed Justinian his colleague, and in 527 invested him with supreme authority. Soon after ascending the throne, Justinian commenced an active persecution against the Arians, Jews, and Pagans. About 532 serious revolts occurred, in one of which the church of Saint Sophia and other buildings were destroyed by fire. This sedition, in which thirty thousand insurgents are said to have fallen, was incited by the factions of the circus, and was only quelled by the prompt resolution of Belisarius at the head of the imperial guards. Justinian showed great clemency to those of his rebellious subjects who were made prisoners. He immediately began to repair the damages of the conflagration. The magnificent church of Saint Sophia, which is one of the most remarkable edifices of any age or country, was rebuilt upon the plan furnished by the architect Anthemius. Justinian also exhibited his liberality and architectural skill in the construction of temples, convents, roads, bridges, aqueducts, and fortifications in many parts of his vast empire. But by far the greatest work of his reign was the revision of the Roman law and the publication of the Codes, Pandects, and Institutions which bear his name, and which were compiled under his supervision by the eminent jurist Tribonian. The "Codes," consisting of twelve books, were completed in 534. The "Digesta" or "Pandectæ," embracing all that was taken from the decisions, arguments, and expositions of the civilians of Rome, were subsequently issued in fifty books. The "Institutiones" were an abridgment of the first principles of the law for the use of students. Justinian also composed many new laws, mostly in Greek, entitled "Constitutiones Novellæ." While he was thus rendering such eminent service to the world by the publication of his Codes and Pandects, his celebrated generals Belisarius and Narses carried the terror of his arms into Persia, Italy, and Africa, and made their master the sovereign of nearly all the territory over which the first Cæsars had held dominion. (See BELISARIUS, and NARSES.) Justinian gave liberal encouragement to the industrial arts, and was the first to introduce silk-worms and the manufacture of silken goods into Europe. He died in 565, after a reign of more than thirty-eight years, and was succeeded by his nephew, Justin II. Justinian, although justly censurable for his occasional intolerance, was distinguished for his general justice and humanity, as well as for his knowledge of theology, philosophy, law, poetry, and architecture, for his administrative powers, and for his exceedingly virtuous and temperate life,—qualities which would have placed him in the highest rank as a monarch, even if he had not produced those Codes which have immortalized his name.

Justinian [Lat. JUSTINIA'NUS] II., son of Constantine III., ascended the throne of Constantinople in 685. He gained important advantages over the Saracens, and compelled them to relinquish some of their conquests. Finally, his great cruelties to his subjects, and also, it is said, his intention of burning Constantinople, caused his general Leontius to depose him, to cut off his nose, and to banish him to the Crimea. He subsequently escaped from the Crimea, and married the daughter of a Turkish chief, with whose assistance, and that of the Bulgarians, he regained his crown. He put Leontius, and many others, to horrible deaths. He was preparing to execute furtner cruelties, when he was killed in 711 by Philippicus Bardanes, who succeeded him.

Juusten or Justen, yoos'tẹn, (PAUL,) Bishop of Åbo, in Finland, was born at Viborg. He was sent in 1569 by John III. of Sweden as an ambassador to Ivan, Czar of Russia. That monarch, on some false pretence against John, threw Juusten in prison, where he was confined for three years. Died at Åbo in 1575.

Juvara, yoo-vâ'rȧ, or Ivara, e-vâ'rȧ, (FILIPPO,) first architect to the Duke of Savoy, was born at Messina, in Italy, in 1685, and educated at Rome under Fontana. He constructed a palace at Messina, and several edifices in Turin. In 1724 he went to Lisbon, where he superintended the building of the royal palace and other edifices, for which he received the order of knighthood and a pension of about three thousand dollars. He died in 1735, at Madrid. Among his best works are the hunting-palace of Stupinigi, and the Birago di Borgaro palace, both in Turin.

Ju'vẹ-nal, [Lat. JUVENA'LIS; Fr. JUVÉNAL, zhü'vâ'nȧl',] or, more fully, Deç'ĭ-mus Ju'nĭ-us Ju-ve-nā'lis, one of the most celebrated of the Latin satirical poets, is believed to have been born in Aquinum, a Volscian town, about A.D. 40. But few authentic facts have been preserved respecting his history: it is said, however, that he was the son of a wealthy freedman, and that he devoted the early part of his life to the study of rhetoric and declamation. He afterwards became a pleader in the courts of law, where he appears to have been successful. He was an intimate friend of the poet Martial, who mentions him in two of his epigrams. None of the productions of Juvenal were given to the public until he had passed the age of sixty years. His poems, which he then recited, gained him universal admiration. One of his earliest satires had been written against an actor named Paris, who was a great favourite with the emperor Domitian. It was not published until the reign of Hadrian, who, imagining that it reflected on one of his own favourites, sent Juvenal into an honourable exile by making him the prefect of a legion in Egypt, where he is said to have died about A.D. 125. Sixteen of his satires have been preserved. Several translations of them have been made into English, of which the most prominent are those of Dryden and Gifford. In these satires Juvenal severely lashes the prevailing vices of his time, but it may well be doubted whether his vivid pictures of the licentiousness of that age do not tend to fan those very passions which they seem intended to restrain. He was distinguished for his force of intellect, his flow of language, and his never-failing wit. "Juvenal gives me," says Dryden, "as much pleasure as I can bear. He fully satisfies expectation; he treats his subject home. . . . When he gives over, 'tis a sign that the subject is exhausted, and that the wit of man can carry it no further." His works, differing equally from the austere moral dialogues of Persius and the genial raillery of Horace, are rhetorical rather than poetical. They are brilliant and sonorous declamations, and master-pieces of denunciation.

"Magnificent versification," says Macaulay, "and ingenious combinations rarely harmonize with the expression of deep feeling. In Juvenal and Dryden alone we have the sparkle and the heat together. Those great satirists succeeded in communicating the fervour of their feelings to materials the most incombustible, and kindled the whole mass into a blaze at once dazzling and destructive." ("Essay on Dryden.") Among the best editions of Juvenal is that of Ruperti, (Leipsic, 2 vols., 1801,) to which are prefixed all the ancient documents for the biography of the satirist.

Jŭx'ŏn, (WILLIAM,) Archbishop of Canterbury, born in Chichester in 1582, graduated at Oxford. In 1621 he was appointed president of Saint John's College, and afterwards received various offices in the Church through the patronage of Archbishop Laud. In 1633 he was successively raised to the sees of Hereford and London. Two years later he was appointed by Charles I. lord high treasurer of England. For about six years he fulfilled the duties of this station with so much justice and ability that, although great hostility was excited that an ecclesiastic should be chosen to that office, no charges were made against his administration. He remained with Charles through his trial, and accompanied him to the scaffold, where he received the dying injunctions of that monarch. On the restoration he was raised to the see of Canterbury. Died in 1663. (See "Memoirs of Juxon and his Times," 1869.)

Ka′ler, (JAMES OTIS,) an American author, born at Winterport, Maine, March 19, 1846, for some years was engaged in journalism in Boston and New York. He is author of several highly successful tales for the young, including "Toby Tyler," "Mr. Stubbs's Brother," "Old Ben," "Tim and Tip," "Raising the Pearl," etc., published under the name of "James Otis."

Kalergis, kā-lĕr′ğis, (DEMETRIUS,) a Greek general and politician, born in Taganrog about 1802. He fought for independence against the Turks. About 1843 he became a general, and governor of Athens. He was minister of war for about two years, (1854–56.) Died in 1867.

Kalf, kâlf, written also Kale, (WILHELM,) a distinguished Dutch painter of still life, born in Amsterdam in 1630. He especially excelled in painting fruit, gold and silver vessels, gems, crystals, etc. Died in 1693.

Kâlî or Kalee, kā′lee, the feminine of Kâlă, (a name of Siva,) forming the common appellation of Siva's consort in her destroying character. She is often called Măhâ Kâlî, (mạ-hâ′ kā′lee,) or the "Great Kâlî," and Bhădră (b'hŭd′rạ) Kâlî, (from Bhadra, one of the many appellations of Siva,) and various other names. She is represented sometimes with four and sometimes with eight hands, and her person is decorated with a necklace of human skulls. Her images are usually painted black or of a dark colour. In her character of Măhâ Kâlî she sometimes represents eternity. (See Coleman's "Mythology of the Hindoos," p. 91.) As active or militant virtue, she is called Durga; in her ordinary and more peaceful character she is known as Pârvatî, (i.e. the "mountain goddess," in allusion to her dwelling on the inaccessible heights of the Himalayas,) or as Dêvî, (dā′vee,) which signifies the "goddess" par excellence. (See DURGA, and PÂRVATÎ.)

Kālīdâsă, Cālīdâsă, kā′lī-dâ′sạ, or Kalidasas, called "the Shakspeare of India," the most illustrious of Hindoo poets, is supposed by some to have lived about 50 B.C., by others about 250 A.D. or even later. Tradition says that he lived under the magnificent reign of Vikramâditya I. He was the author of several dramas, of which the most celebrated, "Sakŏŏntalâ," (or "Sakontalâ,") was first made known to the nations of the West through the prose translation of Sir William Jones. The appearance of this remarkable production excited a deep interest and general admiration among the critics of Europe. Of its author, Alexander Humboldt observes, "Tenderness in the expression of feeling, and richness of creative fancy, have assigned to him his lofty place among the poets of all nations." Goethe expresses his admiration in a still higher strain:

* This word is related etymologically to the middle syllable of the Latin "inter*cal*aris," denoting the reckoning of a day or space of time between other days. The word "kalends" is not improbably from the same root.

"Willst du die Blüthe des frühen, die Früchte des späteren Jahres,
Willst du was reizt und entzückt, willst du was sättigt und nährt,
Willst du den Himmel, die Erde, mit einem Namen begreifen?
Nenn' ich Sakontalá dich, und so ist alles gesagt."•

A translation of the Sakoontalâ, by Monier Williams, the Boden professor of Sanscrit at Oxford, was published at Hertford in 1856. In this version the metrical portions of the original play were for the first time rendered into English verse. Besides the drama already referred to, there have come down to us two others by Kâlidâsa, viz., "Vikrama and Urvasi," which abounds in lyrical beauties, and a comedy entitled "Agnimitra and Malavikâ." His two epic poems, "Raghuvansa" and "Kumâra-Sambhâva," possess, with many individual beauties, comparatively little merit, taken as a whole. Among his lyrical poems, "Megha-duta," or the "Cloud-Messenger," is remarkable for its deep feeling and graceful delineations of nature. The "Nalôdaya," a sort of poetical romance, which, in spite of much that would strike a European reader as ridiculous or absurd, has many charming passages, is also commonly ascribed to Kâlidâsa.

See the notice of Kâlidâsa prefixed to PROFESSOR WILLIAMS's translation of "Sakoontalâ," already referred to; WILSON's "Indian Theatre," in which there are English translations of the "Megha-duta" and an analysis of "Agnimitra and Malavikâ;" also BROCKHAUS, "Conversations-Lexikon." The "Nalôdaya" has been translated into English verse by the REV. W. YATES, Calcutta, 1844.

Kalisch, kâ'lish, (DAVID,) a German humorous poet, of Jewish origin, born at Breslau, February 23, 1820. His verses, plays, and couplets are extremely popular in Germany. He published "Berliner Leierkasten," (1857–60,) and "Lustige Werke," (1870.) Died at Berlin, August 21, 1872.

He is represented as a beautiful youth, sometimes as riding on a parrot, and sometimes as conversing with his mother Mâyâ, or his wife Reti, (or Rati,) (i.e. "Affection.") He has a bow made of sugar-cane, (or, according to some authorities, of flowers.) The points of his arrows are tipped with flowers. Vasanta (the "Spring") is said to be his most intimate friend. The most remarkable event in Kâmadêva's history is his encounter with Siva. It is related that he once presumed to aim one of his arrows at the destroying deity, who with one glance of his eye reduced the love-god to ashes. Since that catastrophe Kâmadêva has ceased to possess any corporeal form; but his actual power seems thereby to have been increased rather than diminished, as he can now more easily, and with less suspicion, exert his sway over the minds of men.

Kâmădhênu, kă'mą-d'hā'nōō, [i.e. "wish-cow," from the Sanscrit kâmă, "desire" or "wish," and dhênu, a "cow,"] in the Hindoo mythology, the name of a wonderful cow, produced by the churning of the ocean, having power to grant to those whom she favoured whatever they might desire. She is also called Surăbhĭ, (sōō'-rą-b'hĭ,) and is in fact a goddess of no mean pretensions, and would appear to occupy nearly the same rank as Vishnu's consort Lakshmî, who also was produced from the churning of the ocean. It is not unusual for the Hindoos, when praying for prosperity or happiness, to say, "May Lakshmî, who resides among the gods, (or "who reposes on the bosom of Vishnu,") become a boon-granting cow to me." He studied medicine, and graduated in the University of Pennsylvania in 1842, on which occasion he wrote an inaugural thesis on "Kyestein." In 1843 he sailed to China with Commodore Parker, as surgeon or physician to the embassy. He visited India, Ceylon, and the Philippine Isles, and was impelled by his adventurous spirit into several perilous enterprises. In 1845 he made an excursion to the Himalaya Mountains, ascended the Nile to Nubia, and traversed Greece on foot. He returned home in 1846. He served in the Mexican war in 1847. In May, 1850, he sailed as surgeon to the expedition which Lieutenant De Haven conducted in search of Sir John Franklin. He published, in 1854, "The United States Grinnell Expedition in Search of Sir John Franklin." He commanded a second expedition sent out for the same purpose, and sailed from New York in the Advance in May, 1853. He failed to find any traces of Franklin, returned home in October, 1855, and related the adventures and sufferings of his party in his "Arctic Explorations," (2 vols., 1856.) In this voyage he had discovered the existence of an open Polar sea. He received a gold medal from the Royal Geographical Society of London. To recruit his failing health, he made a voyage to England in October, 1856, and passed thence to the West Indies. He died at Havana in February, 1857.

Kant, (IMMANUEL,) one of the profoundest metaphysicians that have ever lived, the founder of the Critical (popularly called the Transcendental) school of philosophy in Germany, was born at Königsberg, April 26, 1724. His father was a saddler, and is said to have been of Scottish extraction. Both his parents are represented as having been endued with a severe and inflexible virtue; and to the influence of their precept and example must be ascribed, in no small measure, the pure moral character and that profound respect for moral obligation which Kant exhibited through the whole of his life. Having gone through a course at the gymnasium, (the Collegium Fredericianum,) he entered in 1740 the university of his native city. Here he commenced the study of theology, but soon abandoned it for other pursuits, and devoted his attention to the natural sciences, mathematics, and philosophy. On leaving the university he maintained himself for several years as a private tutor. During this period he published his first work, "Thoughts on the True Estimation of the Living Powers," ("Gedanken von der wahren Schätzung der lebendigen Kräfte.") About 1755 he began to give lectures on logic, physics, metaphysics, and mathematics. In 1762 he was offered the professorship of poetry in the University of Königsberg; but he declined the position, on the ground that he had not the proper qualifications. He had already established his reputation as an original and profound thinker, when at length, in 1770, he was appointed to the chair of logic and metaphysics in the University of Königsberg. When he entered upon his professorship, he delivered a discourse on the World of the Senses and that of the Understanding, ("De Mundi sensibilis et intelligibilis Formâ et Principiis,") containing the germs of the philosophical system which he afterwards developed in his great work entitled "Critique of Pure Reason," ("Kritik der reinen Vernunft,") first published in 1781. He had previously, in his work on "Universal Natural History and Theory of the Heavens," ("Allgemeine Naturgeschichte und Theorie des Himmels," 1755,) in which he may be said to have anticipated the discovery of the planet Uranus, given proof of his sagacity in questions relating to physical science. Among his various other works may be named "Observations upon the Sentiment of the Beautiful and Sublime," ("Beobachtungen über das Gefühl des Schönen und Erhabenen," 1764,) "Critique of Practical Reason," ("Kritik der praktischen Vernunft," 1790,)—that is, reason considered in its application to our moral conduct,—"Critique of the Faculty of Judging," ("Kritik der Urtheilskraft," 1793,) and his essay "On a Plan for an Everlasting Peace," ("zum ewigen Frieden,") (1795.) Kant died February 12, 1804, having never, it is said, in the whole course of his life travelled above seven miles from his native city. Although his writings embrace a great variety of subjects, his fame rests chiefly upon his achievements as a metaphysician. As a deep and close thinker he has perhaps never been equalled.* Our limits will not permit us to give even an outline of the Kantian system of philosophy, which could only be rendered intelligible in an extensive treatise. It will be sufficient here to observe that Kant's great aim was to determine the laws and limits of the intellect of man, and thus to guard, on the one hand, against the arrogant dogmatism of those who overestimate, and, on the other, against the absurd skepticism of those who underestimate, the powers of the human mind. He does not pretend to have made any important discoveries respecting questions which belong properly to religion, (such, for example, as the immortality of the soul, the moral attributes of the Deity, etc.,) but he claims that the great points of faith are not only undisturbed by his system, but are rendered more secure against the attacks of those who use their reputation for philosophic insight to give weight to arguments against religion, in questions where, from the necessary laws of the human intellect, the profoundest philosopher can know no more than the great mass of mankind. "Only by this means," (i.e. by a critique determining the laws and limits of the human reason,) says he, "can the roots of materialism, fatalism, atheism, . . . be cut off;" and he proposes in this manner "to make an end for all future time of all objections against morality and religion, by presenting the clearest proofs of the ignorance of their assailants." It is claimed by some of the admirers of Kant (indeed, he himself suggested the parallel) that he performed for mental philosophy a service similar to that which his countryman Copernicus performed for astronomy. As the latter may be said to have determined the relative importance as well as the true position of the earth in the solar system, so the former has determined the proper limits and true position of the human intellect in relation to the objects of knowledge; and as Copernicus has demonstrated that many of the apparent motions of the heavenly bodies are not real, but caused by the motion of the earth, (the standpoint of the observer,) so Kant has shown that many mental phenomena are to be explained, not by referring them, as most philosophers have done, to independent external causes, but to those essential laws which regulate the movements of the mind itself.

For an excellent popular notice of the influence exerted by Kant's philosophy, the reader is referred to De Quincey's chapter on German Literature in the volume of his works entitled "Life and Manners." He will also find many interesting observations on Kant and his writings in Madame de Staël's "Germany," Part III. chap. vi.

In 1789 he commenced a tour through England, France, Switzerland, and other countries of Europe. On his return he published "Letters of a Travelling Russian." He afterwards issued various literary productions, which were written in a finished and elegant style. He was one of the editors of the "European Messenger," a literary journal. In 1803 he was appointed historiographer of Russia, and the same year commenced his great work, the "History of the Russian Empire," (11 vols., 1815–24.) He did not live to finish the work, which ends about the year 1610. No work in the Russian language has obtained greater popularity. The first edition, of eight volumes, brought the author 100,000 rubles. The emperor Alexander created him councillor of state and knight of the order of Saint Anne; and after the death of the historian his widow received from the same monarch an annual pension of 50,000 rubles. "The History of the Russian Empire" has been translated into French, German, and Polish. Died in May, 1826.

Karpocrates. See CARPOCRATES.

Karr, kâr, (JEAN BAPTISTE ALPHONSE,) a popular French novelist, born at Munich in 1808, was a son of Henri Karr, a pianist. He produced in 1832 a novel entitled "Sous les Tilleuls," in which the public admired the mixture of irony and sentiment, of fancy and good sense. About 1837 he became editor of the "Figaro," and of a satirical monthly periodical called "The Wasps," ("Les Guêpes.") Among his numerous novels are "Fa dièse," (1834,) "Vendredi Soir," (1835,) and "La Famille Alain," (1848.) He also wrote an ingenious work on flowers and gardens, "Voyage autour de mon Jardin," (2 vols., 1845.) Died September 30, 1890.

Kars'lake, (Sir JOHN BURGESS,) Q.C., an English lawyer and statesman, born at Bencham, near Croydon, in 1821. In 1867 he became a member of the House of Commons, and in the same year was appointed solicitor-general, in which capacity he also acted for a time under Disraeli in 1874, but was compelled to resign on account of failing sight. Died in London, October 4, 1881.

Karsten, kar'stẹn, (DIETRICH LUDWIG GUSTAV,) a German mineralogist, born at Bützow in 1768. He wrote many able treatises on mineralogy. Died in 1810.

See LEOPOLD VON BUCH, "Lobrede auf Karsten," in the "Abhandlungen der Berliner Akademie," 1814; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Karsten, (FRANZ CHRISTIAN LORENZ,) a German agriculturist and writer, an uncle of the preceding, was born at Bützow in 1751; died in 1829.

Karsten, (KARL JOHANN BERNHARD,) an eminent Prussian mineralogist, son of the preceding, was born at Bützow in 1782. He was appointed privy councillor of mines in the ministry of the interior in 1819. He published a treatise "On the Carbonaceous Substances of the Mineral Kingdom," (1826,) a "System of Metallurgy," (5 vols., 1832,) a "Philosophy of Chemistry," (1843,) and other important works. In his peculiar department of science Karsten occupied the highest rank. Died in 1853.

Kăs'son, (JOHN ADAMS,) an American statesman, born near Burlington, Vermont, January 11, 1822. He graduated at the University of Vermont in 1842, and became a lawyer. Having removed to Iowa, he was made first assistant postmaster-general under President Lincoln in 1861, was United States postal commissioner to Europe, and signed postal conventions with nearly every important nation in Europe, was a Republican member of the Thirty-Eighth, Thirty-Ninth, Forty-Third, Forty-Fourth, Forty-Seventh, and Forty-Eighth Congresses, and served as United States envoy and minister to Austria-Hungary, 1877–81. He went to Germany as United States minister in 1884.

Kästner or Kaestner, kĕst'nẹr, (ABRAHAM GOTTHELF,) an eminent German mathematician, astronomer, and poet, born at Leipsic in September, 1719. He became assistant professor of mathematics at Leipsic in 1746, and obtained the chair of mathematics and physics at Göttingen in 1756. In 1762 he succeeded Tobias Mayer as director of the Observatory at Göttingen. He wrote, besides numerous works on mathematics and astronomy, and witty epigrams, a "History of Mathematics from the Revival of Science to the End of the Eighteenth Century," (in German, 4 vols., 1796–1800.) Died in June, 1800.

Kâsyapa, kăs'ya-pa, called also Kăn'ă-dă, a celebrated Hindoo sage or philosopher, was a son of the preceding, and was one of the greatest of Hindoo logicians. He founded the atomistic philosophy called "vaiseshika."

Kate, Ten, tĕn kā'tẹh, (JAN JAKOB LODEWYK,) a Dutch clergyman, born at the Hague, December 23, 1819. He was educated at Utrecht, and became a pastor at Amsterdam. Besides eight volumes of poems, largely religious, he published many translations from foreign languages, and a number of scientific works having a religious tone.

Kate, Ten, tĕn kā'tẹh, (LAMBERT,) a Dutch clergyman, who lived about 1720. He is known for his valuable grammar of the Dutch language, (Amsterdam, 1723.) He also wrote "On the Connection between the Gothic and Dutch Languages," and a "Life of Jesus Christ."

See SAX, "Onomasticon."

Kā'tẹr, (HENRY,) F.R.S., a skilful mathematician, born in Bristol, England, in 1777, was educated in the Royal Military College in Sandhurst. He was distinguished for his investigations of the principles of reflecting telescopes; for his experiments to determine the exact length of the seconds-pendulum; for his important advice and improvements on measures and weights; and especially for his invention of the floating collimator, an instrument for adjusting the telescope. In 1814, when the emperor Alexander of Russia visited England, Kater was decorated by him with the order of Saint Anne. He wrote several mathematical treatises. Died in 1835.

Katona, kŏt'o-nŏh, (STEPHEN,) an eminent Hungarian scholar and historian, was born at Papa in 1732, and became a Jesuit at the age of eighteen. He afterwards filled the chairs of poetry, rhetoric, and history in the University of Buda. Died in 1811. His chief production is a History of Hungary, written in Latin, ("Historia critica Regum Stirpis Austriacæ," 41 vols., 1795 et seq.) This is regarded as the most valuable and accurate work upon the subject. It closes with the year 1801. Katona was also the author of several other historical works, in the Latin and Hungarian languages.

See G. FEJÉR, "Memoria S. Katonæ," 1812.

Katt, von, fon kăt, a Prussian officer, born in 1681, was an intimate friend of Prince Frederick, afterwards Frederick the Great. For having aided him in his attempt to escape to England, Katt was executed before the prison-windows of the prince, in 1730.

Kauer, kŏw'ẹr, (FERDINAND,) a German musical composer, born in Moravia in 1751. His works, amounting in all to nearly two hundred, consist of church music, operas, symphonies, concertos, etc. Died in 1831.

Kauffmann, kŏwf'mân, (MARIA ANGELICA,) the daughter of a portrait-painter, was born at Coire, in Switzerland, about 1741. After studying painting in Italy, she went under the patronage of Lady Wentworth to England, where in a short time she gained considerable celebrity in her art. Her popularity was probably as much due to her accomplished manners and her superior education as to any excellence which she possessed as an artist. In 1781 she was married to Antonio Zucchi, a Venetian painter, whom she accompanied to Italy in the following year. She still retained her maiden name of Kauffmann. Died at Rome in 1807.

Kaufmann, kŏwf'mân, (JOHANN GOTTFRIED,) a German mechanician, born at Chemnitz, in Saxony, in 1751, was the inventor of several very ingenious instruments, among which was a flute- and harp-clock, (Floten- und Harfenuhr,) which was purchased by the Elector Frederick Augustus. Died in 1818. His son FREDERICK, born in 1785, invented the automaton trumpeter and other similar works. Died in 1866.

Kaufmann, von, fon kŏwf′mân, (KONSTANTIN PETROVITCH,) a Russian general, born at Maidani, February 19, (O.S.,) 1818. He entered the army as an officer of engineers in 1839, and obtained promotion slowly, though distinguished for valour. In 1867 he was appointed Governor-General of Turkestan, where he made important conquests and in other ways extended the Russian influence. In 1874 he was made engineer-general of the army. He is charged with having acted with extreme cruelty towards the conquered people of Turkestan. Died at Tashkent, May 15, 1882.

Kaulbach, kŏwl′bȧk, (WILHELM,) one of the most eminent painters of recent times, was born in the principality of Waldeck, Germany, in 1805. Though destined by his father to be an artist, he showed little inclination for painting, until a collection of engravings illustrating Schiller's tragedies fell into his hands and gave the first impulse to his genius. He began his studies under Cornelius at the Academy of Dusseldorf about 1822, and in 1829 finished his picture of the "Mad-House," ("Irrenhaus,") a work displaying such originality and power as entitled him at once to a place among great painters. About this time he executed the frescos of "Apollo and the Muses," in the Odeon, and "Cupid and Psyche," in the palace of Duke Max, at Munich. In 1837 he completed his "Battle of the Huns," founded on the tradition of the combat before the gates of Rome, between the Romans and the spirits of the Huns who were slain, which, rising in the air, continued the fight. This wonderful production, so strange and unique in its character, was received with general applause, and is justly regarded as a miracle of art. His second great historical piece, "The Destruction of Jerusalem by Titus," was finished in 1838; and a copy of it, executed in oil at the request of King Louis of Bavaria, occupies a conspicuous place in the Pinakothek. Kaulbach also illustrated, somewhat in the style of Hogarth, Schiller's "Criminal from Lost Honour," Goethe's "Faust," and "Renard the Fox," ("Reineke Fuchs:") the last displays exquisite humour. Besides the above-mentioned works, he painted a number of portraits, and furnished illustrations for Shakespeare and other poets. Kaulbach excelled in the highest qualities of his art, and was eminently successful in blending in his style the ideal and symbolic with the real. He was director of the Academy of Arts at Munich, and a member of nearly all the similar institutions of Europe. Died April 7, 1874.

Kaunitz, von, fon kŏw′nits, (WENZEL ANTON,) PRINCE, a celebrated Austrian statesman and diplomatist, born at Vienna in February, 1711. After travelling in England, France, and Italy, he was appointed by the emperor Charles VI. aulic councillor, (1735.) On the accession of Maria Theresa he was made in 1745 minister-plenipotentiary to Charles of Lorraine, Governor of the Netherlands. In 1748 he was a member of the Peace Congress at Aix-la-Chapelle, and was soon after created minister of state and knight of the Golden Fleece. Having been sent as ambassador to France in 1750, he negotiated the secret alliance between that country and Austria. He was soon after appointed chancellor of state and chancellor of Italy and the Netherlands. He enjoyed the unbounded confidence of the empress, to whose service he was devoted, and the principal measures of her government are to be ascribed to his influence. He acted a prominent part in the ecclesiastical reforms of Joseph II. The court of Rome, offended by these innovations, called Kaunitz "the heretical minister," ("il ministro eretico.") For a long time he was considered as the oracle of diplomacy, and exercised such an influence over the direction of affairs that he was jestingly called "The Coachman of Europe." Kaunitz was a generous patron of learning and the arts, and was himself an accomplished scholar. Died in 1794.

Kaup, kŏwp, (JOHANN JAKOB,) a German naturalist, born at Darmstadt, April 10, 1803; died July 4, 1873.

Kausler, von, fon kŏws′lẹr, (FRANZ,) a German officer and military writer, born at Stuttgart in 1794, served in the campaigns against the French from 1812 to 1815. He published a "History of the Wars of all Nations and Times," (5 vols., 1826–32,) and a "Life of Prince Eugene of Savoy," (2 vols., 1839.) Died in 1848.

Kautz, kawts, (AUGUST VALENTIN,) an American soldier, was born at Ispringen, Baden, January 5, 1828, and in that year was taken by his parents to Ohio. He graduated at West Point in 1852. During the war of 1861–65 he attained the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers, and for a time commanded the cavalry-division of the Army of the James. He published "The Company Clerk," (1863,) "Customs of Service for Non-Commissioned Officers and Soldiers," (1864,) and "Customs of Service for Army Officers," (1866.)

Kav′a-naugh, (HUBBARD HINDE,) D.D., a Methodist bishop, born in Clark county, Kentucky, January 14, 1802, became a preacher in 1823, and in 1854 a bishop, being connected with the Southern branch of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Died at Columbus, Mississippi, March 19, 1884.

Kavanagh, kăv′ȧ-năH, (JULIA,) a distinguished writer of tales and romances, born in the county of Tipperary, Ireland, in 1824. In 1848 she published "Madeleine," a tale from real life, which was very successful, and her romance of "Nathalie" (1851) was still more admired. She also wrote a biographical work entitled "Woman in France during the Eighteenth Century," (2 vols., 1850.) Her writings are remarkable for their beautiful delineation of character and graceful simplicity of style. She died October 28, 1877.

Kay, (JOHN,) an English poet, was the first that received in England the title of poet-laureate. He flourished about 1480.

Kay, (JOHN,) a miniature-painter and engraver, born near Dalkeith, in Scotland, in 1742. For several years he gained a livelihood as a barber in Edinburgh; but, having exhibited a talent for sketching, he was assisted by a wealthy gentleman, that he might devote himself entirely to art. His paintings were distinguished for their correct and exact likeness to the original. He etched about nine hundred plates, which contained portraits of the distinguished or eccentric personages of Edinburgh at that date. These were published, under the title of "Kay's Edinburgh Portraits." Died in 1826.

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen."

Kay or Key, kī, (WILLEM,) a Flemish historical painter, born in Breda in 1520. Of his most admired productions we may mention a portrait of Cardinal Granvelle, and a large painting in which the chief magistrates of Antwerp were introduced of the size of life. Died in 1568.

See DESCAMPS, "Vies des Peintres Flamands," etc.

Kay-Shuttleworth, shŭt′tẹl-wọrth, (Sir JAMES PHILLIPS,) an English lawyer, born in 1804. He was noted for his activity in advancing the interests of public schools. For several years he held the office of secretary to the committee of the privy council on education. Died 1877.

Kaye. See CAIUS.

Kaye, kā, (JOHN,) an English ecclesiastic, born in 1783, became Bishop of Lincoln about 1827. Died in 1853.

Kaye, (JOHN WILLIAM,) an English historical writer, born in London about 1814. He published, besides other works, a "History of the War in Affghanistan," (1851,) a "Life of Sir John Malcolm," (1856,) and a "History of the Sepoy War," (1866.) Died July 24, 1876.

Kayser, kī′zẹr, (KARL PHILIPP,) a German Latin scholar, born at Enzisheim, November 18, 1773; died November 18, 1827.

Kayser, (KARL LUDWIG,) a German scholar, a son of the preceding, was born at Heidelberg, February 3, 1808. He was distinguished alike as a Homeric scholar and philologist and as a musical genius. Died May 1, 1872.

Kayserling, kī′zẹr-lĭng, (MOSES,) a Hebrew preacher and author, was born at Hanover, Germany, June 17, 1829. He was educated at Berlin, and was (1861–70) chief rabbi of the Swiss Jews, removing in 1870 to Pesth. His works include "Romantic Poetry of the Jews of Spain," (1859,) "History of the Jews of Spain and Portugal," (1860,) "History of the Jews of England," (1861,) "Life of Moses Mendelssohn," (1862,) etc.

Kazinczy, kŏz′int-se, (FRANCIS,) a Hungarian nobleman, distinguished for his contributions to the literature of his country, was born at Er-Semlyn in 1759. He devoted his attention to the restoration of the Hungarian language, which the emperor Joseph II. was attempting to extirpate. This dialect had then partially fallen into disuse, and many terms to express modern significations were required to be added in order to give it a reasonable degree of completeness. To effect this, Kazinczy translated numerous works from the French, German, and English, adding words where the original Hungarian was deficient. In this undertaking he appears to have been eminently successful. In 1788 he established the first Hungarian magazine, entitled "Magyar Muzeum," and two years later commenced the "Orpheus." In 1794 he was arrested on a charge of conspiracy and condemned to death. This sentence, however, was commuted to imprisonment, and after the expiration of about six years he regained his liberty. He wrote various poems, and several works in prose. Died of cholera in 1831.

Kazwyny, (ZACHARIA BEN MOHAMMED.) See CAZWEENEE.

Keach, keech, (BENJAMIN,) an English Baptist minister, born in Buckinghamshire in 1640. After the restoration he was bitterly persecuted on account of the principles which he had advanced in his writings. He preached some years in London after 1668. The most important of his works are the "Key to open Scripture Metaphors," (1682,) and "Exposition of the Parables," (1704.) He also wrote two works in imitation of Bunyan, viz., "Travels of True Godliness," and "Travels of Ungodliness." Died in 1704.

See CROSBY, "History of the Baptists."

Kēan, (CHARLES J.,) a distinguished actor, the son of Edmund Kean, was born in Waterford, Ireland, in 1811, and studied at Eton. He made several visits to America, the last of which was in 1866. About 1846 he became the manager of the Princess's Theatre, London, to the popularity of which he contributed greatly by the introduction of the most admirable machinery, such as had never before been exhibited to the British public. He was also employed to superintend the royal theatricals at Windsor Castle. Died in London, January 22, 1868. (See his "Life," by J. W. COLE.)

Kean, (EDMUND,) a celebrated tragedian, born in London about 1787. He was the son of an actress named Ann Carey, and, while very young, was brought upon the stage to play those parts in which children were represented. In this capacity he performed before George III. at Windsor Castle, greatly to the satisfaction of that monarch. In 1814 he first appeared at Drury Lane Theatre, in the character of "Shylock," with such distinguished success that he not only fully established his own fame, but also retrieved the declining popularity of the theatre. He afterwards visited America, where he remained two years. Died in 1833. As a tragedian Kean is considered not inferior to any one that has appeared on the English stage. His remarkable success was owing to his great application in the study of his characters and the intensity of passion which he threw into them. He especially excelled in his representations of "Shylock," "Othello," and "Richard III."

See PROCTER, "Life of E. Kean," 1835; F. W. HAWKINS, "Life of Edmund Kean;" OXBERRY, "Dramatic Biography."

Kean, (ELLEN,) known also by her maiden and professional name of ELLEN TREE, an excellent actress, both in tragedy and comedy, the wife of Charles J. Kean. She was born in London in 1805, first appeared upon the stage in 1823, was married in 1842, retired from the stage in 1868, and died August 20, 1880.

Keane, keen, (JOHN,) LORD, a celebrated British general, was born at Belmont, in the county of Waterford, in 1781. He entered the army at the age of thirteen. In 1799 he was promoted to the grade of captain, and was appointed aide-de-camp to Earl Cavan in Egypt. In 1812 he served as colonel in Spain under Sir Arthur Wellesley, afterwards Duke of Wellington, and was present at the engagements of Vitoria, Toulouse, and other important battles. He was subsequently sent to America, where, with the rank of major-general, he took part in the battle of New Orleans, January, 1815. In 1833 he was appointed commander of the forces of Bombay, and in 1838 became general-in-chief of the British army sent against the Afghans. In 1839 he besieged the fortress of Ghuznee, which had been regarded as impregnable, and which was garrisoned with 3500 men, well supplied with all the munitions of war. The place was, however, taken by assault in forty-eight hours, with a loss of only two hundred on the side of the British. For this victory General Keane was raised to the peerage, with the title of Baron Keane of Ghuznee. Died in 1844.

Keane, (JOHN JOSEPH,) D.D., a bishop, born at Ballyshannon, Ireland, September 12, 1839, came in boyhood to Baltimore, was educated in the Roman Catholic institutions of Maryland, was ordained a priest in 1866, and in 1878 was consecrated Bishop of Richmond, Virginia.

Kearney or Kearny, kar′ne, (PHILIP,) an able American general, born in the city of New York in June, 1815. He was sent to Europe by the government to study the French cavalry tactics about 1838. He obtained the rank of captain in 1846, served in the Mexican war, and lost his left arm near Mexico in 1847. Having resigned his commission in 1851, he passed several years in Europe, and served in the French army at Solferino, (1859.) He became a brigadier-general of the Union army in 1861. He commanded a division at the battles of Williamsburg, May 5, Fair Oaks, May 31, White Oak Swamp, June 30, and Malvern Hill, July 1, 1862. In the month last named he was raised to the rank of major-general. He was killed at the battle of Chantilly, September 1, 1862.

Kearny, (STEPHEN WATTS,) a major-general in the United States army, an uncle of the preceding, was born in Newark, New Jersey, in 1794. He entered the army as lieutenant in 1812, and distinguished himself at the battle of Queenstown. Promoted to the rank of brigadier-general on the breaking out of the Mexican war in 1846, he marched westward from the Arkansas, conquered New Mexico, and established a provisional government at Santa Fé. He was brevetted major-general for his gallantry at the battle of San Pasqual, December 3, 1846. In the following spring he was for some time Governor of California. Died in 1848.

Kēar′ў, (ANNIE,) an English author, born at Bilton, in Yorkshire, March 3, 1825, the daughter of a clergyman of Irish birth. She published "Castle Daly," "A Doubting Heart," "Clemency Franklyn," and other novels, besides tales and verse for children, and "Heroes of Asgard," a work on Norse mythology. She was of a deeply religious nature. Died at Eastbourne, March 3, 1879.

Keate, keet, (GEORGE,) F.R.S., an English author, born in Wiltshire in 1729. During his travels on the continent he made the acquaintance of Voltaire, with whom he was a correspondent for a long time. Of his works we may mention the poems of "Ancient and Modern Rome," (1760,) and "The Alps," (1763.) He compiled an account of the "Pelew Islands" (1788) from manuscripts placed in his hands by Captain Wilson. Died in 1797.

Kēat′ing, (GEOFFREY,) D.D., a Catholic priest and historical writer, was born in Tipperary, Ireland, about 1600. His chief production is a "History of Ireland from the Time that it was Planted after the Flood until the Seventeenth Year of the Reign of Henry II." This work, which is replete with fables and traditions, was translated from the Irish by Dermot O'Connor, and published in London, in 1738.

Kēats, (JOHN,) a celebrated English poet, born in London in 1795 or 1796, and educated in the classics at Enfield. He published his first poems in 1817, at the recommendatory of Leigh Hunt. His "Endymion," which appeared soon after, was severely criticised by Gifford in the "Quarterly Review." As Keats was of a very sensitive disposition, it is supposed that this criticism aggravated the disease under which he was suffering. He died in 1821 at Rome, whither he had gone to reside on account of his health. The poetry of Keats, though exhibiting a vivid perception of the beautiful, and great power of fancy, is deficient in intensity and force; and his celebrity is perhaps to be attributed as much to the circumstances attending his early death as to his poetical abilities. Besides the "Endymion," we may mention, as among the most important of his works, "Hyperion," "Lamia," and "Isabella."

"We had never happened," says Lord Jeffrey, "to see either of these volumes [Endymion" and "The Eve of Saint Agnes"] till very lately, and have been exceedingly struck with the genius they display, and the spirit of poetry which breathes through all their extravagance. . . . Mr Keats, we understand, is still a very young man; and his whole works, indeed, bear evidence enough of the fact. They are full of extravagance and irregularity, rash attempts at originality, interminable wanderings, and excessive obscurity. They manifestly require, therefore, all the indulgence that can be claimed for a first attempt;—but we think it no less plain that they deserve it; for they are flushed all over with the vivid lights of fancy, and so coloured and bestrewn with the flowers of poetry that, even while perplexed and bewildered in their labyrinths, it is impossible to resist the impression of their sweetness, or to shut our hearts to the enchantments they so lavishly present." ("Edinburgh Review" for August, 1820.)

Keble (kee'bel or kee'bl), (JOHN,) an English divine and poet of high reputation, was born at Fairford, in Gloucestershire, on the 25th of April, 1792. He was educated at Oxford, elected a Fellow of Oriel College some time, and ordained a priest in 1816, soon after which date he left the university. For twenty ensuing years he was employed as his father's curate at Fairford. He was an intimate friend of John Henry Newman, and one of the leaders of the Tractarian movement in favour of High-Church doctrines, or Puseyism. According to Dr Newman, Keble was the primary author of this movement. In 1827 he published "The Christian Year: Thoughts in Verse for the Sundays and Holidays throughout the Year," which obtained almost unbounded popularity, and passed through fifty editions or more. He was appointed professor of poetry at Oxford in 1831, and became vicar of Hursley in 1835. About this time he married Charlotte Clarke. He contributed to the "Tracts for the Times," (1833-41,) and published a number of sermons. Among his popular works is "Lyra Innocentium: Thoughts in Verse on Christian Children, their Ways and Privileges," (1846.) "By English church people without number," says the "North British Review," "'The Christian Year' has long been not only a cherished classic, but a sacred book, which they place beside their Bible and their Prayer-Book. . . . Popularity is no word to express the fact that this book has been for years the cherished companion, in their best moods, of members of the best men, of the most diverse characters and schools, who have lived in our time." Died in March, 1866.

Kemble, (ADELAIDE.) See SARTORIS.

Kem'ble, (CHARLES,) a brother of Mrs. Siddons and J. P. Kemble, was born in South Wales in 1775. He was educated at Douay, in France, and became an actor at the age of eighteen. In 1792 he performed at Drury Lane as "Malcolm" in "Macbeth," and continued upon the stage as a successful actor until 1840. Died in 1854.

See OXBERRY'S "Dramatic Biography;" "Fraser's Magazine for December, 1854.

Kemble, (ELIZABETH,) a daughter of Roger Kemble, was born in Lancashire, England, in 1761. She made her first appearance in London in 1783. In form and expression, as well as in the applause which she received, she has been compared to her sister, Mrs. Siddons. In 1785 she married an actor named Whitlock, whom she accompanied to America in 1792. In this country she became a great favourite, and performed several times before General Washington. Died in 1836.

Kemble, (FRANCES ANNE,) often called FANNY KEMBLE, a popular English actress and writer, born in London in 1811, was a daughter of Charles Kemble. She performed both tragedy and comedy with eminent success. About 1832 she accompanied her father to the United States, where she married Pierce Butler, from whom she was divorced in 1849, and afterwards, for nearly twenty years, resided in Lenox, Massachusetts. She published a "Journal of a Residence in America," (1835,) "The Star of Seville," a drama, (1837,) "Journal of a Residence on a Georgian Plantation in 1838–39," (1863,) "Records of a Girlhood," (1878,) and "Records of Later Life," (1882.) Died January 16, 1893.

Kemble, (JOHN MITCHELL,) an Anglo-Saxon scholar and historian, son of Charles Kemble the actor, was born in 1807, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. For several years he was the editor of the "British and Foreign Quarterly Review." He became a member of various foreign scientific and historical societies. His chief work is entitled "The Saxons in England; a History of the English Commonwealth till the Period of the Norman Conquest," (2 vols., 1849.) Died in 1857.

See "Fraser's Magazine" for March and May, 1857.

Kemble, (JOHN PHILIP,) an eminent English tragedian, brother of the celebrated Mrs. Siddons, and son of Roger Kemble, was born at Prescot, in Lancashire, in 1757. He first appeared on the stage at the age of ten years. He was afterwards educated at the Roman Catholic seminary at Douay, France. In 1776 he again went on the stage, and rose rapidly to the first rank in his profession. In 1783 he first performed as "Hamlet" in London at the Drury Lane Theatre. He subsequently became a shareholder and manager in the Covent Garden Theatre. He retired from his profession in 1817. On this occasion a public dinner was given him, at which Lord Holland presided. On account of ill health, he then went to reside in the south of France, and afterwards at Lausanne, in Switzerland, where he died in 1823.

A competent and impartial critic thus states his impressions of Kemble as an actor: "His performances throughout evince deep study and application, joined to amazingly judicious conception. They are correct and highly-finished paintings, but much laboured. . . . Though my head is satisfied, and even astonished, yet my heart is seldom affected. . . . Once, I must own, however, I was completely overpowered by his acting. It was in the part of Zanga. . . . I could not have believed that tragic representation could so far deceive the senses and the judgment." ("Life and Letters of Irving," vol. i. p. 156.) As an actor, Kemble excelled in the highest order of tragedy. He possessed an elegant and discriminating taste, and was learned and refined. His manners were uncommonly attractive. He enjoyed a high character as a gentleman and a man of honour.

See BOADEN, "Memoirs of John P. Kemble," 2 vols., 1825.

Kemble, (PRISCILLA,) an English actress, wife of the preceding, was born about 1755; died in 1845.

Kemble, (ROGER,) a distinguished actor, born in Hereford, England, in 1721. In 1753 he married Sarah Ward, an actress, by whom he had twelve children. Among these were Mrs. Siddons, John Philip Kemble, Elizabeth Kemble, and Charles Kemble, all of whom are mentioned in this work. Died in 1802.

Kemény, kĕm'ā̈ñ, (SIGMUND,) BARON OF, a Hungarian writer and journalist, born in 1816. In 1849 he was elected to the National Assembly at Pesth, where he advocated the revolutionary cause. The next year he became one of the editors of the "Respublica." He wrote several popular romances. Died Sept. 22, 1875.

Kemp, (GEORGE MICKLE,) the designer of the Scott monument at Edinburgh, was born at New Hall, in Scotland, about 1794. He was employed for a time as a draughtsman, and, when plans were requested for the Scott monument, he furnished one which was preferred, though he did not live to see the execution of it. Died in 1844.

See CHAMBERS, "Biographical Dictionary of Eminent Scotsmen," (Supplement.)

Kemp, (JAMES,) D.D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal diocese of Maryland, born in Scotland in 1764, came to the United States in 1787, and for more than twenty years was rector at Great Choptank, Maryland. He was bishop of that diocese, and provost of the University of Maryland, from 1816 until his death, in 1827.

Kemp, (JOHN,) an English prelate, born in Kent about 1400, was elected Archbishop of Canterbury in 1452, and subsequently became lord chancellor. He had distinguished abilities both as a primate and statesman. Died in 1454.

Kemp, (JOSEPH,) a distinguished musical composer, and organist of the cathedral of Bristol, was born at Exeter in 1778; died in 1824. Among his productions are the anthems "I am Alpha and Omega," "A Sound of Battle is in the Land," and "The Siege of Ischia," an opera.

Kempelen, von, fon kĕm'pẹh-lĕn, (WOLFGANG,) a famous mechanical genius, and the inventor of the chess machine, was born at Presburg in 1734. His remarkable talent for chess-playing made him a favourite at the court of Maria Theresa, who created him an imperial councillor. In 1769 he exhibited to the empress his so-called automaton chess-player, a figure in size and appearance like a Turk, which, though opposed by the best players, was nearly always victorious; but, after astonishing and puzzling all Europe, it was discovered that the figure concealed within it a Russian dwarf, a famous chess-player, who directed its motions. He also invented the speaking-machine, having the form of a wooden box provided with a bellows. This was made to speak words distinctly in a voice like that of a child. Kempelen wrote a treatise "On the Mechanism of Human Speech." Died in 1804.

Kem'pẹn-fẽlt, (RICHARD,) an English admiral, the son of a Swede in the English service, was born at Westminster in 1720. He was distinguished for his gallantry and activity, and in 1779 was made a rear-admiral. He went down with the "Royal George," at Spithead, August 29, 1782, a calamity touchingly commemorated by Cowper in a poem "On the Loss of the Royal George." Kempenfelt wrote some good religious poetry, of which the lyric "Burst, ye emerald gates" is the best-known.

Kem'pẹr, (JACKSON,) D.D., LL.D., an American bishop, born in Pleasant Valley, New York, December 24, 1789. He graduated at Columbia College in 1809, took orders in the Episcopal Church in 1814, and was for twenty years a clergyman of Philadelphia. In 1835 he was consecrated a missionary bishop for the Western States. In 1859, after long and severe labours throughout a wide field, he was made Bishop of Wisconsin. Died at Delafield, Wisconsin, May 24, 1870.

Kemper, kĕm'pẹr, (JAN MELCHIOR,) an able Dutch jurist, born at Amsterdam in 1776. He became professor of law at Leyden in 1809, and published a number of works on law. Died in 1824.

See M. SIEGENBEEK, "Memoria J. M. Kemperi," 1824.

Kem'pẹr, (REUBEN,) an American officer, born in Fauquier county, Virginia. He distinguished himself in various engagements against the Spaniards in Florida and Mexico, and took part in the defence of New Orleans under General Jackson. Died in 1826.

Kempis, à, â kĕm'pis, (THOMAS,) or THOMAS Ham'ẹr-kẹn, a celebrated German ascetic writer, born at Kempen, in the diocese of Cologne, about 1380. He became an inmate of the monastery of Mount Saint Agnes, and spent much time in copying religious books. He is said to have employed fifteen years in writing a copy of the Bible. He also wrote several original treatises. His reputation is founded on the well-known work entitled "De Imitatione Christi;" but it remains an unsettled question whether he composed or only transcribed it. Many volumes have been written on each side of this question. Died in 1471.

Kĕn, (THOMAS,) a celebrated English prelate, born at Berkhamstead in 1637, and educated at Oxford. About 1679 he went to Holland as chaplain to the Princess of Orange. He was afterwards appointed chaplain to Charles II., who raised him to the see of Bath and Wells in 1684. "He was," says Macaulay, "a man of parts and learning, of quick sensibility and stainless virtue. . . . Before he became a bishop, he had maintained the honour of his gown by refusing, when the court was at Winchester, to let Eleanor Gwinn [a mistress of Charles] lodge in the house which he occupied there as a prebendary. The king had sense enough to respect so manly a spirit. Of all the prelates he liked Ken the best." Deprived of his bishopric as a nonjuror upon the coronation of William III., he was regarded with the highest esteem even by his opponents. Queen Anne, upon her accession, granted him a pension. He was the author of several volumes of elaborate sermons, and of many poetical productions of a religious character. "His Morning and Evening Hymns," says the writer above quoted, "are still repeated daily in thousands of dwellings." He died in 1711.

Kĕn'dạl, (GEORGE,) an English nonconformist minister, born in Devonshire, was a Calvinist. He became rector of Blissland, in Cornwall, from which he was ejected about 1662. Died in 1663.

Kendal, (MARGARET BRUNTON,) an English actress, better known by her stage and maiden name of MADGE ROBERTSON. She was born at Great Grimsby, March 15, 1849, went upon the stage in 1865, and in 1869 married Mr. Kendal, an actor, whose name was originally Grimston. Mrs. Kendal is one of the leading actresses in comedy of the recent British stage.

Kĕn'dạll, (AMOS,) an able American statesman, born at Dunstable, Massachusetts, in 1789. He graduated at Dartmouth College in 1811, and subsequently, removing to Kentucky, became a tutor in the family of Henry Clay. He supported General Jackson in the Presidential campaign of 1829, and was afterwards appointed by him an auditor of the treasury department. He was made postmaster-general in 1835, and continued to fill that post till 1840. He began about 1844 a Life of General Jackson, of which the first volume was published several years ago. Died in 1869.

See notice in the "Democratic Review" for March, 1838, (with a portrait;) "Life of Jackson."

Kĕn'dall, (G.,) an English missionary, who laboured in New Zealand, and opened a school there in 1816. He acquired a thorough knowledge of the language of that country, and wrote a "Grammar and Vocabulary of the Language of New Zealand," (1820.) He was drowned at sea in 1835.

Kendall, (GEORGE WILKINS,) an American writer and journalist, born at Amherst, New Hampshire, in 1810. He removed in 1835 to New Orleans, where he became associated with Mr. Lumsden as editor of the "Picayune." In 1841 he accompanied the Santa Fé expedition from Texas, of which he published an account after his return. He brought out in 1851 a work entitled "The War between the United States and Mexico," with coloured plates of the principal conflicts. Died in 1867.

Kendall, (JOHN,) an English writer, and member of the Society of Friends, born about 1725; died in 1814. Among his works are a "Life of Thomas Story," and "Precepts of the Christian Religion."

Kendi, Al. See ALCHINDUS.

Kĕn'drick, (ASAHEL C.,) D.D., an American scholar and Baptist clergyman, born at Poultney, Vermont, in 1809. He graduated at Hamilton College, New York, in 1831. He was afterwards appointed professor of Latin and Greek at Madison University, and in 1850 Greek professor in the University of Rochester, New York. He has published a number of religious and miscellaneous works.

Kendrick, (NATHANIEL,) D.D., a Baptist divine, born in Hanover, New Hampshire, in 1777, was appointed professor of theology and moral philosophy in Hamilton College (now Madison University) in 1822. His labours contributed greatly to the prosperity of the institution. Died in 1848.

Ken-ēal'ў, (Dr. EDWARD VAUGHAN HYDE,) a British lawyer and author, born at Cork in 1819. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and became noted as a translator of songs from foreign languages, of which he had a wonderful knowledge. His ardent zeal on behalf of "the Tichborne claimant" in 1873 gave him even greater fame. His paper "The Englishman," founded in 1874, had a very great popularity, and in 1875 he was sent to Parliament. His principal works are "Brallaghan," (1845,) and "Goethe, a New Pantomime," (1850.) Died in London, April 16, 1880.

Kenicius, kā-nee'she-us, (PETER,) Archbishop of Upsal, Sweden, during the reign of Gustavus Adolphus, was born in 1555. Kennedy, (WALTER,) a Scottish poet, born in Ayrshire about 1450. He is chiefly known by his "Flyting," or rhymed controversy with the poet Dunbar; but his best extant work is "The Praise of Age." Died in 1508.

Kennedy, (WILLIAM,) a Scottish poet and littérateur, born at Paisley in 1799. He published in 1827 "Fitful Fancies," and in 1830 "The Arrow and the Rose, and other Poems." He resided for some years at Galveston, Texas, as British consul, and wrote a work entitled "The Rise, Progress, and Prospects of the Republic of Texas," (1841.) He returned to Great Britain in 1847, and died in 1849.

Ken'nęt, (BASIL,) a clergyman of the Church of England, and brother of Bishop Kennet, born in Kent in 1674, was educated at Oxford. He became chaplain to the English factory at Leghorn. He returned to England on account of ill health. He wrote various antiquarian and historical works, among which are "The Antiquities of Rome," (1696,) relating to the history of the republic, and "Lives and Characters of Ancient Greek Poets," (1697.) Died in 1715.

See "Biographia Britannica."

Kennet, (WHITE,) an English prelate and author, born at Dover in 1660, was educated at Westminster School and at Oxford. In 1699 he received the degree of D.D., and in 1718 was ordained Bishop of Peterborough. He was distinguished as a preacher of great eloquence and as a scholar of indefatigable industry and perseverance, as well as for his opposition to the High-Church party. Died in 1728. Of his numerous works we may mention "Parochial Antiquities attempted in the History of Ambrosden, Burcester, and other Adjacent Places in the Counties of Oxford and Bucks," (1695,) and "A Register and Chronicle, Ecclesiastical and Civil," (1728,) relating to the reign of Charles II.

See W. NEWTON, "Life of White Kennet," 1730; "Biographia Britannica."

Ken'nęth I., King of Scotland, died, after a short reign, in 606, and was succeeded by Eugene III.

Kenneth II. succeeded his father, Alpin, as King of the Scots, in 834. He carried on a successful war against the Britons, and reduced the Picts to subjection. He is said to have been the first sovereign who swayed a sceptre over all Scotland. Died about 858 A.D.

Kenneth III. ascended the throne of Scotland in 970. He repelled the invasions of the Danes, established a just and efficient government in his dominions, and is said to have been the first monarch who gave Scotland a written code of laws. He was assassinated in 994.

See BUCHANAN, "History of Scotland."

Ken'ney, (CHARLES LAMB,) an English dramatist, critic, and journalist, son of James Kenney, and godson of Charles Lamb, was born in 1823. His principal works were "The Gates of the East," and "Life and Letters of Balzac." Died August 25, 1881.

Kenney, (JAMES,) an Irish poet, born in 1780. He published "Society, with other Poems," (1803,) and wrote several successful farces and plays, among them "Raising the Wind" and "Sweethearts and Wives." Died in 1849.

Ken'nĭ-cott, (BENJAMIN,) a learned divine and Hebrew scholar, born at Totness, in Devonshire, England, in 1718. While a student at Oxford, he wrote two dissertations, one "On the Tree of Life in Paradise," and the other "On the Oblations of Cain and Abel," which procured for him, free of expense and before the usual period, the degree of B.A. He was soon after elected a Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, became canon of Christ Church, and obtained the degree of M.A. in 1750. In 1753 he published a treatise on "The State of the Printed Hebrew Text of the Old Testament," in which he unfolded his plan of collating the Hebrew manuscripts of the Old Testament. Although his efforts met with opposition from some of the clergy, a large sum was raised to aid him in his enterprise, and several men of learning were employed to assist him in his labours. His "Hebrew Bible," the result of these labours, was issued in 1776, with the various readings attached. Dr. Kennicott and his assistants in this valuable work consulted sixteen Samaritan and over six hundred Hebrew manuscripts. Died at Oxford in 1783.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Ken'nọn, (ROBERT LEWIS,) a Methodist divine and physician, born in North Carolina in 1789. He excelled in various branches of science, particularly geology, and is said to have been the first to call attention to the coal-fields of Alabama. Died in 1838.

Kĕn'rick, (FRANCIS PATRICK,) D.D., a Catholic prelate, born at Dublin in 1797, emigrated in 1821 to America. In 1842 he succeeded Dr. Conwell as Bishop of Philadelphia. He was created Archbishop of Baltimore in 1851, and was afterwards appointed by the pope "primate of honour," having precedency over all other Catholic prelates of the country. He enjoyed a high reputation for learning, and published, among other works, "Dogmatic Theology," and "Moral Theology," (both in Latin.) Died in 1863.

Kenrick, (PETER RICHARD,) D.D., brother of the preceding, was born at Dublin in 1806. Having removed to Philadelphia, he became editor of the "Catholic Herald." On the death of Dr. Rosati, in 1843, he succeeded him as Bishop of Saint Louis, and in 1847 was made first archbishop of that city. He has founded several charitable institutions, and has been active in promoting the cause of education.

Kĕn'rick, (WILLIAM,) an English writer, noted for his quarrelsome disposition, born in Hertfordshire about 1720, published "Epistles, Philosophical and Moral," in poetry, (1759,) "A Review of Dr. Johnson's New Edition of Shakspeare," (1765,) which caused a controversy with Johnson's friends, a "Dictionary of the English Language," and a poem called "Love in the Suds," for which he was sued for damages by Garrick, whom he had libelled in it. Died in 1779.

See BAKER, "Biographia Dramatica."

Ken'sett, (JOHN FREDERICK,) an American landscape-painter, born in Cheshire, Connecticut, in 1818. He studied in London, and in 1845 exhibited at the Royal Academy his "View of Windsor Castle." He afterwards visited Rome, where he executed several excellent pictures of Italian scenery. Among his best American landscapes may be named "Sunset in the Adirondacks," "Franconia Mountains," and "Hudson River from Fort Putnam." He became a member of the National Academy of Design in 1849. Died in 1872.

See TUCKERMAN, "Book of the Artists."

Kent, (CHARLES; in full, WILLIAM CHARLES MARK,) an English journalist and Roman Catholic author, born in London, November 3, 1823. He was educated in the colleges at Prior Park and Oscott. In 1859 he was called to the bar at the Middle Temple. Among his publications are "The Vision of Cagliostro," (1847,) "Aletheia," (1850,) "Dreamland," (1862,) "A Mythological Dictionary," "Catholicity in the Dark Ages," "Footprints on the Road," "Poems," (1870,) "Corona Catholica," (1880,) etc. His wife (née ANN YOUNG) is a successful novelist.

Kent, (EDWARD,) DUKE OF, father of Victoria, Queen of Great Britain, and the fourth son of George III., was born in 1767. He studied at Göttingen and Geneva. In 1790 he entered the army, and three years later assisted in the capture of Saint Lucia. In 1796 he was appointed lieutenant-general, and in 1799 was created Duke of Kent and Strathern and Earl of Dublin. In 1802 he became Governor of Gibraltar; but, his rigid discipline producing a mutiny, he was soon after recalled. In 1818 he married a daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg. The Duke of Kent was a liberal patron of benevolent enterprises. Died in 1820.

See "Life of Edward, Duke of Kent," by ERSKINE NEALE, 1850.

Kent, (EDWARD,) LL.D., an American judge, born in Concord, New Hampshire, in 1802. He graduated at Harvard, and in 1825 settled as a lawyer in Bangor, Maine. He was afterwards twice Governor of the State, and became an associate justice of the supreme court of Maine in 1859. Died at Bangor, May 19, 1877.

Kent, (JAMES,) a distinguished organist and musical composer, born at Winchester in 1700. He became one of the children of the Chapel Royal in London. Upon finishing his education, he was successively chosen organist of Trinity College, Cambridge, and of Winchester Cathedral. He published a popular work containing "Twelve Anthems" of his composition. Died in 1776.

See BURNEY, "History of Music."

Kent, (JAMES,) an eminent American jurist, born in Putnam county, New York, in July, 1763. He graduated at Yale College in 1781, studied law, and commenced the practice of his profession at Poughkeepsie. In politics he was a Federalist. He was profoundly versed in legal knowledge. He became a resident of the city of New York about 1793, and a friend of Alexander Hamilton. In 1798 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court of New York, and in 1804 became chief justice. He lectured on law at Columbia College. His important decisions in law and equity have been preserved in the Reports of Johnson and Caines. He became chancellor in 1814, and retired from that office in 1823, after which he was again professor of law in Columbia College. He published "Commentaries on American Law," (4 vols., 1826–30,) which is a standard work of high authority and a production of great literary merit. Referring to this work, Judge Story remarks, "These Commentaries have already acquired the reputation of a juridical classic, and have placed their author in the first rank in the benefactors of the profession. They embody the principles of law in pages as attractive by the persuasive eloquence of their style as they are instructive by the fulness and accuracy of their learning." ("On the Conflict of Laws.") "It will be a proud distinction to Kent and Story," says the "Edinburgh Review" for October, 1852, (p. 340,) "that they have done more than any other men to put an end to the indifference of English lawyers to the learning of their American brethren." Judge Kent had a high reputation for virtue. He died in New York in December, 1847, leaving one son, William.

See JOHN DUER, "Discourse on the Life of James Kent;" "National Portrait-Gallery of Distinguished Americans," vol. ii.; ALLIBONE, "Dictionary of Authors," vol. ii.; DUYCKINCK, "Cyclopædia of American Literature," vol. i.

Kent, (MARIA LOUISA VICTORIA,) DUCHESS OF, born in 1786, was a daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg. She was married about 1803 to Prince Emich Karl of Leiningen, and again to the Duke of Kent in 1818. Victoria, Queen of England, was the issue of her second marriage. Died in 1861.

Kent, (WILLIAM,) the founder of the English style of landscape-gardening, was born in Yorkshire about 1685. He studied painting, which he soon abandoned for ornamental architecture. Among his best designs is that of the temple of Venus at Stowe. His fame, however, rests chiefly on the great improvement he effected in landscape-gardening, by substituting the close imitation of nature for the stiff and formal style of the French and Dutch. Walpole has styled him "the creator of modern gardening." Died in 1748.

See WALPOLE, "Anecdotes of Painting."

Kent, (WILLIAM,) an American lawyer, son of James Kent, the eminent jurist, noticed above, was born in 1802. He was appointed by Governor Seward a judge of the circuit court of New York. Having resigned that office, he practised law in New York City. Died in January, 1861.

Kent'ĭ-gĕrn, SAINT, a Scottish ecclesiastic, became Bishop of Glasgow. He is said to have converted many of the natives to Christianity. Died about 600.

Ken'tŏn, (SIMON,) an American soldier, born in Fauquier county, Virginia, was one of the associates of Daniel Boone, the Kentucky pioneer. He fought against the Indians on the Western frontier, and subsequently in the war of 1812. Died in 1836.

Kenyon, (LLOYD,) LORD, an eminent English lawyer, and chief justice of the king's bench, was born at Greddington, in Flintshire, October 5, 1732. He became in 1754 a member of Lincoln's Inn, and was admitted to the bar in 1761. With too high a sense of honour to employ artifice, and having no influential friends to assist him, several years elapsed before he obtained practice. In 1779 he distinguished himself by his able defence of Lord George Gordon, on trial for treason. Three years later he was made attorney-general. In 1788 he was appointed chief justice of the king's bench and was raised to the peerage, with the title of Lord Kenyon, Baron Greddington. He died in 1802, after having amassed a large fortune. Lord Kenyon was generally popular, though his extremely parsimonious habits, added to his overbearing and haughty manner towards the barristers as well as towards his associate judges, made him no favourite with the members of his profession. As a justice, he was distinguished for his strict adherence to the letter of the law, and for his impartial severity upon offenders of every rank.

See LORD CAMPBELL, "Lives of the Chief Justices;" "Sketch of the Life, etc. of Lord Kenyon," London, 1802; Foss, "The Judges of England."

Keogh, ke'o, (WILLIAM,) an Irish lawyer, born at Galway in 1817. He published "The Practice of the Court of Chancery in Ireland." In 1856 he became a judge of the common pleas. Died September 30, 1878.

Kepler, kĕp'lẹr, or Keppler, [Lat. KEPLE'RUS,] (JOHANN,) a celebrated German astronomer, born at or near Weil, in Würtemberg, on the 27th of December, 1571. His father, Henry Kepler, lost nearly all his property by becoming surety for a friend, and was reduced to the position of tavern-keeper at Elmendingen. About 1586 he entered the monastic school of Maulbronn, where he was educated at the expense of the Duke of Würtemberg. He continued his studies at Tübingen, which he quitted in 1591 with the degree of master. In 1594 he was appointed professor of mathematics at Grätz, in Styria. He published, under the title of "Mysterium Cosmographicum," (1596,) an account of his inquiries and speculations in relation to the number, distances, and periodic times of the planets. In 1597 he married a widow named Barbara von Muller. Kepler and the other Protestant professors were driven from Grätz by persecution about 1600. He visited Tycho Brahe, who then resided near Prague, and who introduced him to the emperor Rudolph. At the request of Rudolph, he began to assist Tycho in the formation of astronomical tables; but his relations with that astronomer were not very agreeable to either.

On the death of Tycho, in October, 1601, Kepler succeeded him as principal mathematician to the emperor, with a salary of 1500 florins, and inherited his unpublished observations. He published in 1604 an important contribution to the science of optics, entitled a "Supplement to Vitellio." After he obtained the patronage of the emperor he resided for some years at Linz. In 1609 he produced his greatest work, "Astronomia nova, seu Physica celestis tradita Commentariis de Motibus Stellæ Martis," in which he announced two of the laws which regulate the periods and motions of the planets, and which are known as Kepler's Laws. These are: 1, that the orbits of the planets are elliptical; 2, the radius-vector, or line extending from a planet to the sun, describes or passes over equal areas in equal times; 3, the squares of the periodic times of planets are proportional to the cubes of their mean distances from the sun. "These laws constitute undoubtedly," says Sir John Herschel, "the most important and beautiful system of geometrical relations which have ever been discovered by a mere inductive process, independent of any consideration of a theoretical kind. They comprise within them a compendium of the motions of all the planets, and enable us to assign their places in their orbits at any instant of time, past or to come." "This beautiful and simple law," says Professor Playfair, in reference to the third law, "had a value beyond what Kepler could possibly conceive; yet a sort of scientific instinct instructed him in its great importance. He has marked the year and the day when it became known to him: it was on the 8th of May, 1618." His third law was discovered with infinite satisfaction in 1618, and announced in his "Harmonice Mundi," (1619,) the title and contents of which recall the ideas of Pythagoras on celestial harmony. Kepler imagines that in this music of the spheres Saturn and Jupiter perform the bass, Mars the tenor, and the Earth and Venus the haute-contre. He considered the sun to be the source of motion as well as of light and heat. The treasury of the emperor was so exhausted by war that Kepler could not obtain the payment of his salary, and often felt the pressure of poverty. After the death of Rudolph, (1612,) he was appointed professor of mathematics at Linz. His first wife having died, he married Susanna Rettinger, about 1614. In 1620 he was visited by Sir Henry Wotton, an English ambassador, who invited him to remove to England; but he declined. He expended the labour of several years on his "Rudolphine Tables," which were published in 1627 and were highly prized. Among his important works is his "Dioptrica," (1611,) in which he describes the astronomical telescope with two convex lenses. The invention of this form of telescope is ascribed to him. Kepler was so devoted to science, and had so little regard for riches, except those of the mind, that he used to say he would rather be the author of the works he had written than possess the duchy of Saxony. He died at Ratisbon in November, 1630, leaving four sons and three daughters.

Khosroo or Khosru, KOS'roo', written also Khosrou, Khosrau, KOS'rŏw, and Khosrew, [Gr. Χοσρόης; Lat. CHOS'ROES,] surnamed in Persian NOUSHIRVÂN, nŏw'shĭr-vân', or NOOSHIRVÂN, (NUSCHIRWÂN,) said to signify "Generous Soul," the greatest of the Sassanide sovereigns, was the son of Kobâd, (Cabades,) whom he succeeded on the throne of Persia, A.D. 531. At an early age he displayed extraordinary talents for government, and upon his accession to the throne immediately commenced a reform, which the corrupt reign of his father had rendered necessary. By the retrenchment of expenditures, and other means, he greatly improved the state of the finances. He appointed none but the most efficient men to offices; he established a strict and impartial justice throughout his dominions; he remodelled his army, and suppressed the Zendiks, who were promulgating doctrines immoral and dangerous to the state. He also concluded a peace with the emperor

Justinian, who paid the Persian monarch ten thousand pounds of gold. He afterwards carried on wars with various Asiatic nations, extending his empire as far as the Indus. Alarmed at the successes of Belisarius in Italy and Africa, he resolved to strike a sudden blow. In 540 he invaded Syria, pillaged and burned several cities, including Antioch, and took a multitude of prisoners and an immense amount of booty. The next year he was opposed by Belisarius, one of the greatest generals of that or of any age. The Roman commander, with a small number of ill-disciplined soldiers, succeeded in holding in check the innumerable hosts of Persia. But in 542 this great general was recalled, and Khosroo, having now nothing to fear, went from victory to victory. The war continued until 562, when Justinian purchased a treaty for thirty thousand pieces of gold. Hostilities were again renewed under the emperor Justin, and the King of Persia met at length with a total defeat, in 578, from Justinian, the general of the emperor Tiberius. Khosroo died in 579. The long and beneficent reign of this prince is mentioned by Oriental poets as the golden age of Persia. His virtues, his wise and efficient measures for the welfare of his subjects, his conquests, his liberal encouragement of literature and science, attested by the numerous colleges and libraries which he founded, all rendered it worthy of this eminent distinction. A Pehlvi translation of the celebrated Bidpay or Pilpay Fables of India was made under the auspices of this prince. He was succeeded by Hormisdas IV.

Khosroo, Khosru, or Khosrau (or Chosroes) II., surnamed PARVEEZ or PARWÎZ, pär'veez', i.e. the "Generous," son of Hormisdas IV., and grandson of Khosroo I., was raised to the throne of Persia upon the deposition of his father, A.D. 590. He was soon after driven from his capital by the rebel Bahrâm, and obliged to seek the protection of Maurice, the Emperor of the East. This sovereign, with a powerful army, overthrew the rebels and reinstated Khosroo. In 602 Maurice was assassinated by the usurper Phocas. Khosroo immediately took up arms to avenge his death, and by a series of victories in a few years subjugated the greater part of the Greek empire, and at length appeared before the gates of Constantinople. Heraclius, the successor of Phocas, having vainly attempted to obtain a favourable peace, resolved bravely to meet his foe in the field. He gained repeated victories, and in five years drove the Persians out of every province which they had wrested from the empire. Khosroo was assassinated in 628. He had married a Christian lady named Shereen, (Shirîn,) distinguished for her exquisite beauty. She poisoned herself at his grave. The romantic and unchanging affection of these royal lovers, together with their tragic end, has furnished the subject of many an Oriental poem.

Khosroo, Khosrou, or Khosru I., King of Armenia, surnamed THE GREAT, a brave prince and able general, ascended the throne 198 A.D. He conquered the nations of the Khazars and Basiliens, and overran the greater part of the Persian dominions. He was assassinated in 232.

Khosroo, Khosrou, or Khosru II., the second Christian King of Armenia, and a contemporary and ally of Constantine the Great, ascended the throne in 314. Died in 325.

Khosroo, Khosrou, or Khosru III. was placed upon the throne of Persian Armenia by the King of Persia in 387, whilst the legitimate king Arsaces ruled that part of Armenia which belonged to the Romans. Khosroo gained several important victories over the neighbouring nations, and upon the death of Arsaces annexed Roman Armenia to his own dominions. In 392 the King of Persia, suspecting Khosroo of the design to render himself independent, took him prisoner, and placed another prince on his throne. After remaining in captivity twenty-one years, he was restored to his kingdom. His death occurred soon after.

King, (MITCHELL,) LL.D., a distinguished jurist and scholar, born in Scotland in 1783. He removed to Charleston, South Carolina, where he devoted himself to the study of law. He was one of the founders of the Philosophical Society at Charleston, and was appointed in 1819 judge of the city court.

King, (PETER,) LORD, an eminent lawyer and high chancellor of England, born at Exeter in 1669, was the son of a grocer. His talents and application attracted the attention of his maternal uncle, the celebrated John Locke, through whose influence he was sent to the University of Leyden. After his return to England he studied law, gained admission to the bar, and rapidly rose in his profession. He was elected about 1700 a member of Parliament for Beer-Alston, which seat he retained for several years. In 1708 he was appointed recorder of London, and was knighted. Notwithstanding the arduous duties of his profession, King found time to write two able theological works, which alone would have made him celebrated. They are an "Inquiry into the Constitution, Discipline, Unity, and Worship of the Primitive Church," (1691,) (in which he favoured the rights of the Protestant dissenters,) and the "History of the Apostles' Creed, with Critical Observations on its Several Articles," (1702.) In 1714 Sir Peter King was created chief justice of the common pleas, and in 1725 was made lord chancellor, and raised to the peerage, as Baron King of Ockham. He was attached to the Whig party. He resigned the seals in 1733, on account of ill health. Died in 1734.

King, (RUFUS,) an American statesman, born in Scarborough, Maine, in 1755, graduated at Harvard in 1777. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1780, and became an eloquent pleader. In 1784 he was elected a delegate to the Continental Congress, in which he offered in 1785 a resolution "That there be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in any of the States described in the resolution of Congress of April, 1784," i.e. the Northwest Territory. He married Mary Alsop, of New York City, in 1786. He took a prominent part in the Convention which in 1787 formed the Constitution of the United States, and became a leader of the Federal party. Having fixed his residence in the city of New York in 1788, he was elected a Senator of the United States in 1789. He advocated Jay's treaty in several eloquent speeches, was re-elected to the national Senate in 1795, and was appointed minister-plenipotentiary to Great Britain in 1796. He performed the duties of this position with much ability for eight years, and retired to private life in 1804. In 1813 he was elected a United States Senator by a legislature of adverse politics. Having been again elected in 1819 or 1820, he continued in that body until 1825, and made an able speech against the extension of slavery on the occasion of the admission of Missouri. He was appointed minister to England in 1825, returned about a year later, and died in April, 1827.

Kirk, (EDWARD NORRIS,) D.D., an American Congregationalist divine, was born in New York in 1802. He graduated at Princeton College, New Jersey, and became in 1828 pastor of a church at Albany. He was afterwards appointed secretary of the Foreign Evangelical Society, and in 1842 settled as pastor of the Mount Vernon Church, Boston. Died March 27, 1874.

Kirk, (ELLEN W.,) an American novelist, second wife of J. F. Kirk, was born in 1842. She was a daughter of Jesse Olney. Among her writings are "Love in Idleness," "A Lesson in Love," "Through Winding Ways," "A Midsummer Madness," etc.

Kirk, (JOHN FOSTER,) an American historian, born at Fredericton, New Brunswick, in 1824. His education was obtained in Nova Scotia. He was secretary and assistant to the historian Prescott from 1847 to 1859. His principal work is the "History of Charles the Bold," (3 vols., 1863–68.) He also edited a new edition of Prescott's works, with notes. In 1871 he became editor of "Lippincott's Magazine."

Kirk'al, (EDWARD,) an English engraver, born in Sheffield about 1700.

Kirkaldy, kẹr-kau'de, (Sir WILLIAM,) of Grange, one of the earliest Protestants of Scotland, was the son of Sir James Kirkaldy, high treasurer under the reign of James V. Sir William was implicated in the assassination of Cardinal Beaton, for which he was imprisoned. He finally escaped to France, where he was distinguished as one of the most valiant and chivalrous knights in the court and army of Henry II. After his return to Scotland, he became a leader of the Protestants. He fought bravely against the French, who had been sent over to assist the Catholics, and made Queen Mary prisoner. He vainly attempted to capture Bothwell, whom he pursued as far as the coast of Norway. About 1570 Kirkaldy espoused the cause of the queen, of whose party he became the leader. He refused to obey the mandates of the regent, and after several months of fighting, in which great ferocity was displayed on both sides, sustained a siege in Edinburgh Castle. He was, however, finally obliged by his soldiers to make an unconditional surrender. He, with several of his friends, was hung in August, 1573. John Knox, who had formerly been his intimate friend and fellow-sufferer in the Protestant cause, deeply deplored his change of principles and his untimely end.

mer, born in Harford county, Maryland, September 27, 1814, was principal of the high school of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, 1843–48, professor of mathematics in Delaware College, 1851–56, in Indiana University, 1856–66, and again was called to that position in 1867. His principal works are "Meteoric Astronomy," (1867,) and "Comets and Meteors," (1873.) He has made important discoveries in astronomical science.

Kirkwood, (SAMUEL J.,) an American Governor, born in Harford county, Maryland, December 20, 1813. In 1843 he was admitted to the bar in Ohio, and in 1856 he was elected a State Senator of Iowa. He was Governor of Iowa, 1860–63, and again in 1875, United States Senator, 1860–67, and 1876–81. He was Secretary of the Interior (1881) under Garfield. Died Sept. 1, 1894.

Kirnberger, kēēRN'bĕRG'ẹr, (JOHANN PHILIPP,) a German musician and writer on art, born in Thuringia in 1721; died in 1783.

Kirsten, kēēR'stẹn, or Kirchstein, kēēRK'stīn, (GEORG,) a physician and writer on surgery and anatomy, born at Stettin, in Pomerania, in 1613; died in 1660.

Kirsten, (MICHAEL,) a learned physician and scientific writer, born in Moravia in 1620; died in 1678.

Kirsten, [Lat. KIRSTE'NIUS,] (PETER,) a distinguished physician and Oriental scholar, born at Breslau in 1577. He studied at the most celebrated universities of Germany, and travelled extensively in Europe. He was subsequently invited to Sweden by Chancellor Oxenstiern, where he was appointed physician to Queen Christina and medical professor in the University of Upsal. He is said to have been master of twenty-six languages. He wrote, among other works, an "Arabic Grammar," (1608–10,) and "Notes on the Gospel of Saint Matthew, from the Collation of Arabic, Syriac, Egyptian, Greek, and Latin Texts," (1611.) Died at Upsal in 1640.

Kisfaludy, kĭsh'fŏh-looj, almost kish'fŏh-looj, (KÁROLY,) a celebrated dramatist, the founder of Hungarian comedy was born at Tete in March, 1790. On account of his fiery and turbulent disposition, he was placed in the Austrian army at an early age. He served as an officer in Italy in 1805 against Napoleon, and was afterwards taken prisoner by the French. Having been exchanged, he fought in Germany in 1809. He left the army in 1810, and fixed his residence at Vienna, where he gained a living as an artist. In 1819 he acquired a sudden celebrity by his play "The Tartar in Hungary." Soon after he produced "Ilka," a tragedy, "Stiber the Chieftain," and several other plays, all of which were received with the greatest applause. Among the most popular of his comedies are the "Student Matthias," of which the emperor Matthias Corvinus is the hero, "The Suitors," and "The Insurgents." Kisfaludy established an able and successful literary annual, entitled the "Aurora." Died in November, 1830.

See T. MUNDT, "Geschichte der Literatur der Gegenwart;" FRANZ SCHEDEL, "Kisfaludy K. Élete," Buda-Pesth, 1832; "North American Review" for April, 1850, (by MRS. PUTNAM.)

Kisfaludy, (SÁNDOR,) an elder brother of the preceding, and one of the most eminent of the poets of Hungary, was born in the county of Szalad in 1772. He entered the army in 1793, and formed an attachment for the beautiful Rosalia Szegedy, who rejected him. He subsequently served against Napoleon in Italy, and was taken prisoner by the French. While a captive in the place where Petrarch had poured forth his immortal strains to Laura, the young Hungarian resolved to address the object of his love in a similar poem. In 1800 he regained the affections of the lady Rosalia, to whom he was married. He left the army and retired to his paternal estate. The same year the anonymous publication of his poem, under the title of "Himfy," produced a sensation among men of letters never equalled in Hungary. In 1807 he made himself known in publishing a poem entitled "Happy Love." He afterwards wrote several other poems and dramas, of which "John Huniades" and "Ladislaus the Rumanian" were greatly admired. Died in 1844. Three years later his complete works were published at Pesth, in 6 vols. Several extracts from "Himfy" have been translated into English.

Kit'to, (JOHN,) an English writer, distinguished as a biblical scholar, born at Plymouth in 1804. He suffered much privation and neglect in his childhood in consequence of the intemperance of his father. About the age of twelve he was rendered incurably deaf by a fall from the roof of a house. He became an inmate of the poor-house, where he manifested such an earnest desire to improve his mind that some persons procured for him admission to a college in Islington. As tutor to the children of Mr. Grove, he travelled in Russia, Armenia, and Persia in 1829–32. About 1833 he was engaged by Charles Knight to write for the "Penny Magazine." He edited "The Pictorial Bible" published by Charles Knight, (1838,) and produced numerous valuable and successful works, among which are "The Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature," (4 vols., 1845–50,) "The Lost Senses—Deafness and Blindness," which contains an autobiography, and "Daily Bible Illustrations," (7 vols., 1849–53.) He was married about 1833. He died at Cannstadt, Würtemberg, in 1854.

Kjöping or Kjoeping, chö'ping, (NIKOLAUS MATSON,) a Swedish traveller, born in 1630. In 1648 he sailed to the East Indies, and afterwards visited Persia, Farther India, Arabia, and Egypt. An account of his travels was published after his death. Died in 1667.

Klaczko, klâtch'ko, (JULIAN,) a distinguished publicist, born at Wilna, in Russian Lithuania, November 6, 1828. He graduated in 1846 at Königsberg, after which time he lived in Germany, Italy, and Austria, but chiefly at Paris. Among his principal books are "Études de Diplomatie," (1866,) and "Les deux Chanceliers," which was translated into various languages. He also wrote "La Poésie polonaise," (1862.)

Klapka, klŏp'kŏh, (General GEORGE,) born at Temesvár, in Hungary, in 1820. He became a cadet in an artillery regiment about 1838, and lieutenant-colonel in 1847. In 1848 he joined the Hungarian revolutionists, and greatly distinguished himself by his daring courage and his ability as a commander. He soon after received a general's commission and was appointed secretary of war. In 1849, while defending the fortress of Comorn, he made a sally at midnight, totally routed the Austrian army, and took several pieces of artillery. He forced his enemies to evacuate Raab, and cut off their communication with Austria. A few days after he received the information that the Hungarian army in the South had surrendered to the Austrians, and also a command from Görgey to yield up the fortress of Comorn. This mandate General Klapka refused to obey; but two months later, having obtained honourable terms from Haynau, he capitulated and went into exile. He strove unsuccessfully to bring about a revolution in Hungary in 1866. He wrote "Memoirs of the War of Independence in Hungary," (1850,) and a work upon the war in the East and the siege of Sebastopol, (1855.) Died May 17, 1892.

Klaproth, klâp'rōt, sometimes Anglicised in pronunciation as klap'rŏth, (HEINRICH JULIUS,) an eminent German Orientalist and traveller, born at Berlin, October 11, 1783, was a son of Martin H. Klaproth, noticed below. At an early age he acquired, without a teacher, considerable knowledge of the Chinese language, and in 1802 founded the "Asiatisches Magazin" at Weimar. On the recommendation of Count Potocki, he was invited in 1805 to Saint Petersburg, where he was made adjunct for the Oriental languages and literature at the Academy of Sciences. In the capacity of interpreter to the Russian embassy to China, he travelled through Siberia as far as Irkootsk in 1805, and collected valuable books and documents, which he used in the composition of his "Asia Polyglotta." In 1807 he was sent by the Russian government on a scientific expedition to the Caucasus, and on his return, in 1809, was appointed aulic councillor, and received a title of nobility and other distinctions. He resigned his offices in Russia in 1812. In 1816, through the influence of William von Humboldt, Klaproth received from the King of Prussia the honorary title of professor of Oriental languages and literature at Berlin, together with a large pension, and permission to reside in Paris. Among his numerous works we may mention "Travels in the Caucasus and Georgia," (2 vols., 1812–14,) "Geographical and Historical Description of the Eastern Caucasus," (1814,) "Historical Pictures of Asia from the Monarchy of Cyrus to the Present Time," (1824,) "Asia Polyglotta," or a classification of Oriental nations according to their languages, (1829,) and "On the Origin of Paper Money in China." Besides these productions, which enjoy the highest reputation throughout Europe, he published a number of excellent maps and geographical treatises, and wrote valuable articles for the "Biographie Universelle." Died in Paris in 1835. Klaproth was one of the greatest linguists of his time. His sagacity, judgment, and memory were extraordinary. "Since Klaproth's death," says the "Encyclopædia Britannica," "his fame has continued to rise. His merits as a philologer are very great; but his merits as a linguist are greater still. . . . His memory, both for comprehensiveness and accuracy, was unrivalled."

Klaproth, (MARTIN HEINRICH,) an eminent German analytical chemist and mineralogist, born at Wernigerode, in Prussian Saxony, in December, 1743. He served an apprenticeship as an apothecary, and about 1768 went to Berlin, where he studied chemistry. Having gained distinction by the analysis of mineral substances and by discoveries in chemistry, he was elected a member of the Academy of Berlin in 1788, and a foreign associate of the French Institute. He discovered the metals Uranium and Titanium, and the earth Zirconia. He published the results of his researches and experiments in his "Contributions to the Chemical Knowledge of Mineral Bodies," (5 vols., 1796–1810.) About 1809 he became professor of chemistry in Berlin. Died in Berlin in 1817.

Kle'bẹr, [Fr. KLÉBER, klà'bair',] (JEAN BAPTISTE,) a celebrated French general, born at Strasburg in 1754. Having studied at the military school of Munich, he returned to France in 1788, and soon attained the rank of adjutant-major. For his gallant conduct at the siege of Mayence, in 1793, he was made general of brigade. He subsequently gained several advantages over the Vendeans; but his generous treatment of the prisoners called down upon him the censures of the committee of safety. He was removed to the army of the North, in which, as general of division, he served under Jourdan. He gained distinguished laurels in 1794 at the battle of Fleurus, where he commanded the left wing of the French army. He soon after captured Mons and the fortress of Maestricht. In 1797, displeased with the Directory, he retired to a country-seat near Paris; but he left this retreat at the request of Bonaparte, whom he accompanied in 1798 to Egypt. He was severely wounded at the siege of Alexandria, of which city he was appointed governor. The following winter he marched into Syria at the head of the French vanguard, reduced El Arish, Gaza, and Jaffa, and gained in April, 1799, the decisive victory of Mount Tabor. On his return to Egypt he added to his already brilliant reputation at the battle of Aboukir. In August, 1799, he was made commander-in-chief by Bonaparte, who returned to France. Though Kleber was very popular, this event caused general dissatisfaction in the army. The soldiers were greatly reduced in numbers, and provisions were scarce. The grand vizier, with over 40,000 men and several English officers, having captured the important fortress of El Arish, was marching against the French. For these reasons Kleber formed a treaty with the Turks and the English admiral Sir Sidney Smith, by which, upon the surrender of all the fortresses in his possession except three, he was to receive from the Turks a large amount of gold and permission to return peaceably to France. He accordingly delivered up several strongholds, and was preparing to sail from Egypt, when he was informed by Admiral Keith that the English government, on the ground that Smith was not vested with full authority, would not consent that the French should leave the country except as prisoners of war. This infraction of the treaty thoroughly aroused the French general. He attacked the Turks, gained over them the brilliant and decisive victory of Heliopolis, drove their army from Cairo, and within a month regained every position which he had previously abandoned. He then turned his attention to the improvement of his conquests. He distributed land among his troops, formed several companies of native soldiers, and was using practicable and efficient means to render Egypt a valuable colony of France, when he was assassinated in June, 1800, by a Mohammedan fanatic. Kleber stands as one of the very first of the many distinguished generals of that period. To his great intellectual powers were joined the generosity of a lofty mind and the hatred of avarice and cruelty. "Kleber," said Napoleon at Saint Helena, "was an irreparable loss to France and to me. He was a man of the brightest talents and of the greatest bravery. Of all the generals I have had under me, Desaix and Kleber possessed the greatest talents."

Klenze, von, fon klĕnt'sẹh, (Leo,) an eminent German architect, born at Hildesheim in 1784. He studied at Brunswick and at Berlin, and afterwards in France, England, and Italy. In 1813 he went to Munich, where he was patronized by the crown-prince Ludwig, and two years later was appointed court architect to the King of Bavaria. In 1833 he was ennobled. Among the most important of his designs are the Glyptothek, a building to receive statuary and gems, completed in 1830; the Odeon and the Pinakothek (picture-gallery) at Munich, completed in 1837; and the Walhalla, or hall of heroes, a magnificent marble edifice near Ratisbon, finished in 1839. This building, the exterior of which resembles the Parthenon, is one of the most remarkable monuments erected in modern times. Klenze, in his designs for buildings, displays an uncommon knowledge of the various styles of architecture; though he regards the Grecian models as superior to all others. He also erected at Saint Petersburg, under the auspices of the emperor Nicholas, the Imperial Palace (completed in 1851) and the Imperial Museum. Klenze published, among other works, an "Essay on the Restoration of the Tuscan Temples," "The Walhalla in its Artistic and Technical Relations," and several collections of Grecian designs. He was likewise skilled in painting, and produced several landscapes and architectural pieces. Died in 1864.

Klingenstierna, kling'ẹn-shĕr'nå, (SAMUEL,) an eminent Swedish philosopher and mathematician, born near Linköping about 1690, was educated at Upsal. Having visited Germany, he became the friend and disciple of the celebrated Wolf. Upon his return to Sweden, in 1730, he was appointed professor of mathematics, and was subsequently chosen tutor to the crown-prince, (Gustavus III.) He performed the duties of this office with great ability, receiving as a reward the order of the Polar Star and the title of councillor of state. He was a Fellow of the Royal Societies of London and of Upsal. Klingenstierna wrote a work on refracting telescopes, which obtained the prize offered by the Academy of Sciences of Saint Petersburg, a treatise on the height of the atmosphere, (1732,) and various other productions. Died at Stockholm in 1785.

Klopp, (ONNO,) a German historian, born at Leer, October 9, 1822. He studied at Bonn, Berlin, and Göttingen, and became an archivist attached to the court of the King of Hanover. He afterwards went to Austria. He wrote a "History of East Friesland," (1854-81,) "Frederick II. of Prussia," (1860,) "The Fall of the House of Stuart," (1875-76, in 4 vols.,) etc.

Klopstock, klop'stok, (FRIEDRICH GOTTLIEB,) a celebrated German poet, born at Quedlinburg, July 2, 1724. He early cherished the ambition of writing an epic poem. About 1746 he went to Jena to study theology, and in 1747 removed to Leipsic. He produced in 1748 the first three cantos of his "Messiah," which had immense success and opened a new era in German poetry. In 1749 he was employed as tutor in a family at Langensalza. He removed in 1751 to Copenhagen, at the invitation of the king, Frederick V., who gave him a pension of four hundred thalers that he might have leisure to complete his great poem. In 1754 he married Margaret (Meta) Moller, an accomplished and literary woman, whom he has commemorated in odes and elegies under the name of "Cidli." He remained twenty years at Copenhagen, where he was patronized by Count Bernstorff and Count Moltke. In 1755 he published five more cantos of the "Messiah." He cherished the idea that he had a great poetical mission. "This idea of an epic priesthood," says Taillandier, "gradually became a reality. He transferred to his poem the events of his life; he regulated his life by the inspirations of his poem." "By his character and conduct," says Goethe in his Autobiography, "Klopstock had succeeded in creating attention and respect for himself and other men of talent. . . . At this time Klopstock came forward and offered his 'Learned Republic' for subscriptions. Although the later cantos of the 'Messiah' could not have the effect of the earlier, partly on account of their contents, partly on account of their mode of treating the subject, which came pure and innocent into a pure and innocent time, the esteem for the poet remained unchanged." The same writer remarks, "On the whole, one might have taken him for a diplomatist. He carried himself with the self-conscious dignity of a person who has a great moral mission to fulfil."

In 1758 he was greatly afflicted by the death of his wife. He settled at Hamburg in 1771, and published in 1773 the last cantos of his "Messiah." The general sentiment of his contemporaries in relation to this poem is thus expressed by Madame de Staël, in her "Tableau de l'Allemagne:" "When the reader commences this poem, he receives an impression like that of a person entering a grand cathedral filled with the music of an organ." His admirers compared him to Homer and Milton; but more sober critics censure his sentimentality, monotony, and lack of action. Although his "Messiah" is seldom read at the present time, all the German schools unite in the expression of honour and gratitude to the author for the impulse which he gave to the national literature. The finest qualities of his genius are displayed in his odes, some of which are considered as classic models of the noble and the graceful. He also wrote a number of sacred dramas, among which is "The Death of Adam." About 1792 he married a widow named Von Winthem. He died at Hamburg in March, 1803.

Knox, (ISA CRAIG,) a Scottish poetess, born in Edinburgh, October 17, 1831. Her maiden name was CRAIG. She published several successful volumes of poetry and prose, among them a "Little Folk's History of England," "Songs of Consolation," "Duchess Agnes," a dramatic poem, etc.

Knox, noks, (JOHN,) the greatest of the Scottish Reformers, was born at Gifford, in East Lothian, in 1505. He was educated at the University of Saint Andrew's, and in theology was a pupil of John Major or Mair. He was ordained a priest about 1530, soon after which a great change took place in his religious opinions. In 1542 he openly renounced the Roman Catholic religion, and became a zealous preacher of the Protestant doctrines, which at that time had few adherents in Scotland. The storm of persecution soon began to beat against him, and it is stated that Cardinal Beaton employed assassins to take his life. In 1547 he retired for safety to the castle of Saint Andrew's, which was occupied by a party of Protestants who had conspired against and killed Cardinal Beaton. During the siege of this place he preached with great power and converted many of its inhabitants. The castle at length was captured by Regent Arran and his French allies, who carried Knox as a prisoner to Rouen. He was confined nineteen months in the French galleys, and released in 1549, after which he preached at Berwick and Newcastle for several years. He was appointed chaplain to Edward VI. about 1551, and was intimate with Cranmer. In 1553 he married Marjory Bowes. On the accession of Queen Mary, (1553,) he was induced by the urgent entreaties of his friends to retire to the continent. He visited Scotland in 1555, after which he passed about three years at Geneva, where he formed a friendship with Calvin, studied Hebrew, and was employed as pastor of a church. In 1558 he published "The First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women." The Scotch Protestants in the mean time had increased in number, and the conflict between the opposing ideas had reached a crisis which required the inflexible resolution and unflinching courage of Knox. He returned to Scotland in May, 1559, and became the master-spirit of the Reformation in that country, which was then ruled by Marie, the queen-regent, a French princess of the family of Guise. The Protestants raised and maintained an army for self-defence, and were animated by the vehement harangues of Knox, who thundered continually against the idolatry of the Romish Church. The Parliament in 1560 renounced the authority of the pope, and adopted a confession of faith proposed by Knox. In 1561 the young queen Mary arrived in Scotland, and had with Knox several interviews, with no satisfactory results. "At my interview with the queen," he wrote to Cecil, "she showed more artifice than I ever found in a person so young." At her instigation, Knox was accused of treason, and tried, but was acquitted, (1563.) His first wife having died, he married in 1564 Margaret Stewart, a daughter of Lord Ochiltree. The projects and influence of Knox were promoted by the abdication of the queen and the appointment of Murray as regent. But in his latter years he was greatly afflicted by the assassination of Murray (1570) and the confusion and disorders which followed that event. He died in November, 1572. Among the Reformers of that age, Knox was distinguished for his courage and sagacity, as well as for his earnestness and the inflexible austerity of his principles. The regent Morton, in a short funeral oration, said of him, "Here lies he who never feared the face of man."

Of Knox, Froude remarks that he was "perhaps in that extraordinary age its most extraordinary man, and whose character became the mould in which the later fortunes of his country were cast." ("History of England," vol. iv. chap. xviii.) In another place he says, "No grander figure can be found in the entire history of the Reformation in this island than that of Knox. . . . The one man without whom Scotland, as the modern world has known it, would have had no existence. . . . His was the voice which taught the peasant of the Lothians that he was a free man, the equal in the sight of God with the proudest peer or prelate that had trampled on his forefathers. He was the one antagonist whom Mary Stuart could not soften nor Maitland deceive; he it was that raised the poor commons of his country into a stern and rugged people, who might be hard, narrow, superstitious, and fanatical, but who nevertheless were men whom neither king, noble, nor priest could force again to submit to tyranny." Kosciusko, kos-se-ŭs'ko, [Polish, KOSCIUSZKO, kôsh-yoo'sko,] (THADDEUS,) an illustrious Polish patriot and general, of noble family, born in Lithuania, February 12, 1746. Having studied at the military academy of Versailles, he embarked about 1777 for America, where he fought with distinction at New York and Yorktown and acquired the friendship of Washington. He returned to Poland in 1786, but, his country being soon after subjected to Russia, he retired to Leipsic. On the breaking out of the revolution of 1794, he was appointed commander of the Polish army, and defeated the Russians with greatly superior numbers at Raclawice. For two months he defended Warsaw against the united forces of Russia and Prussia, but, overpowered at last by fresh troops advancing under Fersen, suffered a total defeat at Maciejowice, where he was wounded and taken prisoner in October, 1794. After two years' imprisonment, he was released by the emperor Paul, who offered him his sword, which Kosciusko refused, saying "he had no need of a sword, since he had no longer a country." When solicited by Napoleon to aid him in his ambitious schemes with regard to Poland, he steadily refused; and the proclamation to the Poles, which appeared in the "Moniteur" under his name in 1806, was declared by him a forgery.

He died in 1817, at Soleure, in Switzerland, having previously written to the emperor Alexander entreating him to give to Poland a free constitution. He also abolished serfdom on his Polish domain.

Kosegarten, ko'zĕh-gar'tĕn, (JOHANN GOTTFRIED LUDWIG,) son of Ludwig Theobul, noticed below, was born in the island of Rügen in 1792. Having studied philology in Paris, he became in 1824 professor of Oriental languages at Greifswalde. He translated into German the Hindoo poem "Nala," (1820,) and made several versions from the Persian. He also published editions of the "Moalakat," and other Arabic works. Died in 1860.

Kosegarten, (LUDWIG THEOBUL,) a German divine and poet, was born at Grevismühlen, in Mecklenburg in 1758. He became in 1808 professor of history at Greifswalde, and subsequently of theology, and rector of the university. His romance of "Ida von Plessen," (1788,) as well as his "Legends" and lyric poems, enjoy a wide popularity. He also made several translations from the Danish and English: among the latter is Richardson's "Clarissa." Died in 1818.

See LONGFELLOW, "Poets and Poetry of Europe."

Koslof, kos'lof, or Kozlov, koz'lof, (IVAN IVANOVITCH,) a Russian poet, born in 1774, made a number of excellent translations from the English. His poems, written after he became blind, are distinguished for their melody of versification and tender pathos. Among the most admired of these is "The Monk," ("Tchernets.") Died in 1838.

Kossuth, kosh'ōōt, (LOUIS,) an eminent Hungarian orator and statesman, born of a noble family at Monok, in the county of Zemplin, in 1802. He studied law at the Protestant college of Sarospatak, and joined the popular party in opposing the despotic policy of Austria. Having offended the government by his writings, he was imprisoned three years, (1837–40.) The Diet of 1840 refused to grant supplies during the imprisonment of Kossuth, who was consequently liberated. In 1841 he married Theresa Meszlenyi, and began to edit a daily paper at Pesth, called "Pesti-Hirlap," the tone of which was liberal, but not radical or democratic. He was elected a member of the Diet by the national party of Pesth in 1847, and acquired a high reputation as an orator. In March, 1848, the Diet adopted a proposition made by Kossuth, the object of which was the appointment of a responsible Hungarian ministry, as a pledge of constitutional reforms. Kossuth and others were sent as a deputation to Vienna, and obtained the assent of the emperor, then conscious of the pressure of a powerful revolutionary movement. Kossuth induced the Diet to vote the perfect equality of civil rights and public burdens for all classes, and to extend the right of suffrage. He became minister of finance in the new ministry formed in April, 1848. Although the benefits of these reforms were shared by the Croatians and Servians, an anti-Magyar party was soon formed in Croatia by the intrigues of Austrian agents. The Croatians, directed by Jellachich and secretly aided by Austria, revolted against Hungary, and began hostilities by the massacre of villagers on the frontier. In June, 1848, the Austrian court openly sanctioned the movements of the Croatian insurgents. Kossuth believed that the time had come to defend by arms the constitution and the national independence. He called for the levy of 200,000 men, which was granted by the Diet. In September, 1848, Jellachich was defeated in battle, and Kossuth was elected president of a committee of defence. After the second insurrection at Vienna, October, 1848, the Hungarian army advanced to the assistance of the Liberals of that capital, but was repulsed at Schwechat. The Austrian general Windischgrätz then invaded Hungary, took Pesth, and committed great atrocities. A war of extermination followed, and the Austrians were defeated in several battles. In April, 1849, the Hungarians renounced allegiance to the house of Hapsburg, and chose Kossuth governor or dictator. But the intervention of Russia rendered the heroic efforts and sacrifices of the Hungarians unavailing. The victories gained by Dembinski, Klapka, and Bem served merely to prolong the national agony. Kossuth, after a disagreement with Görgey, whom he accused of treachery, resigned his office on the 11th of August, 1849, and went into exile. He retired to Turkey, and was imprisoned at Kutaieh. Through the intervention of England and the United States, he was released in August, 1851, visiting those countries in that year and being received with enthusiastic popular demonstrations. He made several admirable speeches in the English language, of which he had acquired a wonderful mastery. He resided for several years in England, and later in Turin, Italy, where he died, March 20, 1894.

Kotzebue, von, fon kot'sĕh-boo, (AUGUST FRIEDRICH FERDINAND,) a prolific and popular German dramatist, born at Weimar in 1761. He went to Saint Petersburg in 1781, and was appointed president of the government of Esthonia. He produced in 1789 "The Indians in England," and "The Stranger," which were very successful. About 1800 he settled in Berlin. He wrote abusive articles against Goethe and other great German authors, who had refused to admit him into their literary circle at Weimar. Between 1802 and 1806 he made journeys in different countries of Europe, and published "Souvenirs of Paris in 1804," (2 vols., 1805.) After the battle of Jena (1806) he took refuge in Russia, and edited two journals, called "The Bee," (1808–10,) and "The Cricket," (1811–12,) in which he wrote against Napoleon. In 1817 he was sent to Germany by the Russian government to watch and report the state and tendency of public opinion. He expressed such hostility and contempt for liberal principles and institutions that he rendered himself odious to many Germans, especially the students. He was assassinated at Mannheim in 1819 by Karl Ludwig Sand, who was actuated by a fanatical zeal against one whom he considered a traitor to liberty. Among his dramas are "The Two Klingsbergs," a comedy, (1807,) and "Pizarro," ("Die Spanier in Peru.") His works, which were very numerous, were formerly more popular than they are at the present time. Kotzebue possessed a ready invention and a great facility in composition; but his productions are deficient in depth and power.

Kotzebue, von, (OTTO,) a son of the preceding, born at Reval, in Russia, in 1787. After having made the voyage around the world with Krusenstern, he set sail again in 1815, accompanied by Chamisso, Eschscholtz, and others. He discovered several islands in the South Sea, and the sound southeast of Behring's Strait called by his name. He published, after his return, a "Voyage of Discovery in the South Sea and to Behring's Strait, to find a Northeast Passage," (1821.) Having sailed for the third time in 1823, he made other discoveries, which are described in his "New Voyage around the World in 1823–26," (1830.) He died at Reval in 1846.

Kotzeluch, kot'sĕh-lo͝ok', (LEOPOLD,) a Bohemian composer and musician, born at Welwarn in 1753. He succeeded Mozart as composer to the court at Vienna, (1792.) He composed operas, symphonies, and sonatas, which were once very popular. Died in 1814.

Krĭshnă, Crishna, Krichna, or Krischna, krĭsh'nạ, [a Sanscrit word, signifying "dark blue:" see below,] in the Hindoo mythology, the eighth avatar of Vishnu, usually regarded as the most glorious of all the manifestations of that deity. It is said by the votaries of Krishna that in the other avatars Vishnu manifested only a portion of his godhead, but that in this instance he appeared in all the fulness of his power and glory. He was born in the kingdom of Mathura; his mortal parents were Văsudêvă and Dêvăkî. It had been predicted that the son of Dêvăkî should deprive Kansa, the tyrannical king of that country, of his life and crown. Kansa therefore sought by force and stratagem to destroy the young child; but the parents, assisted and guided by power divine, succeeded in baffling all his efforts. It is related that, when Krishna was only seven years old, Indra, jealous of the popularity of the child-god, attempted to destroy the worshippers of the latter by a fearful storm of lightning, rain, and hail. But Krishna raised above them on the tip of his little finger Mount Goverdhen, the Hindoo Parnassus, thus affording complete shelter to his trembling followers.

"Them the heavenly child
Called, and with looks ambrosial smiled;
Then with one finger reared the vast Goverdhen,
Beneath whose rocky burden,
On pastures dry, the maids and herdsmen trod:—
The lord of thunder felt a mightier god."
SIR WILLIAM JONES: Hymn to Indra.

One of Krishna's earliest exploits was the destruction of the great serpent Kâliya, (or Kâlinâga,) which poisoned the waters of the river Jumna. Not long afterwards he slew his malignant enemy Kansa, having first paralyzed him with fear. A remarkable resemblance between Krishna and the Grecian Apollo has been pointed out by Sir William Jones and other writers. "In honour of Krishna's triumph," (over Kâliya,) says Moor, "games and sports are annually held in India, as the Pythic games at stated times were exhibited in Greece. . . . Apollo and Krishna are both inventors of the flute. One was disappointed by Daphne, who was turned into the Laurus, hence sacred to Apollo; Krishna's coy nymph was transformed into the Tulasi, alike sacred to him." Krishna was pre-eminently a pastoral god, and his followers were principally milkmaids and herdsmen. Apollo was regarded as the protector of flocks and herds, (his name of Nomios theos (νόμιος θεὸς) is derived from nomē, (νομὴ,) a "meadow" or "pasture;") and, when compelled to pass some time on earth, he employed himself in tending the flocks of Admetus, King of Thessaly.

The pictures of Krishna are usually painted a dark blue, (the colour of VISHNU, which see,) this colour corresponding to the signification of his name. Among his other names are BHAGAVAT, (modern Hindoo pron. b'hŭg'a-vŭt,) the "adorable;" KÊSAVA (kā'sa-va) or KÊSHAVA, "having fine or beautiful hair;" GÔVINDA or GÔPÂLA, the "cow-herd," etc.

Krüdener or Kruedener, (JULIANA,) a Russian mystic or enthusiast, born at Riga in 1766, was the daughter of Baron Vietinghof, and was married at the age of fourteen to Baron Krudener, from whom she was divorced in a few years. She was intimate with Madame de Staël. Having lived for a time in fashionable dissipation, she adopted the views of the Pietists about 1806, and gave herself up entirely to preaching the gospel and prophesying. After travelling in Germany, where she formed an acquaintance with Stilling, she visited Paris, but, owing to the disturbances caused by her meetings, was obliged to leave the city, and soon after her arrival in Germany she was ordered by the government to return to Russia. She died in 1824. She was the author of a romance entitled "Valeria," (1803.) She is said to have had much influence over Alexander, Czar of Russia, who heard her preach in Paris in 1815, and who submitted to her revision his plan of the Holy Alliance. In the latter part of her life she abounded in works of charity towards the poor.

Krummacher, krōōm'mâk'er, (FRIEDRICH ADOLF,) a distinguished German theologian and writer, born at Tecklenburg, in Westphalia, in 1768. He was successively professor of theology at Duisburg, councillor of the consistory, and court preacher at Bernburg. His "Parables" (in verse) (1805) enjoy great popularity both in Germany and in other countries. Among his other works are "Die Kinderwelt," consisting of religious poems for children, "Sufferings, Death, and Resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ," (1817,) "Cornelius the Centurion," (1829,) and "The Life of Saint John," (1833.) He was attached to evangelical religion as distinguished from rationalism. Died in 1845.

See MÖLLER, "F. A. Krummacher und seine Freunde," 2 vols., 1849.

Krummacher, (FRIEDRICH WILHELM,) an eminent pulpit orator and writer, son of the preceding, was born about 1796. He was for a time pastor in Wupperthale, where he was a zealous advocate of the older Lutheranism, and gave great offence by his denunciation of the rationalists. As preacher of a reformed community, he went to New York in 1843. After a few years he returned to Germany, and settled at Berlin in 1847. Among his principal works we may name "The Church's Voice of Instruction," "Elijah the Tishbite," and "Sabbath Bells," (1851.) Died in December, 1868.

Krummacher, (GOTTFRIED DANIEL,) an uncle of the preceding, was born at Tecklenburg in 1774. He became in 1816 reformed preacher at Elberfeld, where he was one of the principal leaders of the Pietists. Among his works are a series of sermons, entitled "The Wanderings of the Israelites through the Wilderness to Canaan," (1850,) and "Daily Manna," which have been translated into English. Died in 1837.

Krumpholz, krŏŏmp'holts, (JOHANN BAPTIST,) a harpist and musical composer, born about 1745, at Zlonitz, near Prague, his father being a band-master in a French regiment. He committed suicide in 1790. His brother, WENZEL KRUMPHOLZ, born in 1750, was an eminent violinist. Died May 2, 1817.

Krünitz or Kruenitz, krü'nits, (JOHANN GEORG,) a German physician and scholar, born at Berlin in 1728, is principally known as the publisher of the "Economico-technological Encyclopædia," seventy-three volumes of which had appeared at the time of his death, in 1796. The work was afterwards continued and largely extended by the brothers Flörke and others.

Krupp, krŏŏp, (ALFRED,) a German manufacturer, born at Essen, April 26, 1812. He inherited from his father the celebrated cast-steel works of his native town, and extended them very greatly. The steel cannon of the establishment are especially celebrated; but the works turn out all kinds of steel goods, and are upon the largest scale ever known. Died July 14, 1887.

Kruse, kroo'zẹh, (FRIEDRICH KARL HERMANN,) a German historian, born at Oldenburg in 1790. In 1825 he published his principal work, entitled "Hellas," and in 1828 was appointed professor of universal and Russian history at the University of Dorpat. He also wrote a valuable "Chronicle of the Northmen." Died in 1866.

Kruse, (KARSTEN or CHRISTIAN,) a learned German writer, the father of the preceding, was born in Oldenburg in 1753. He published "Atlas and Tables for the Survey of the History of all European Countries," (1804.) Died in 1827.

Kruse, kroo'zẹh, (LAURIDS or LAURENT,) a Danish littérateur, born at Copenhagen in 1778. Among his numerous works are comedies, novels, etc. He translated into Danish and German some works of Ingemann, and others. Died in Paris in 1839.

See his Memoirs of his Life, "Erinnerungen aus meinem Leben," 2 vols., 1829.

Kruseman, kroo'zẹh-mân', (CORNELIS,) a Dutch historical painter of great merit, born at Amsterdam in 1797. Among his master-pieces are "A Burial-Scene," "The Preaching of John the Baptist," and "Belisarius." Died in 1857.

Kruseman, (JAN ADAM,) a painter of portraits and sacred history, a brother of the preceding, was born at Haarlem in 1804. Died in 1862.

Krusemark, kroo'zẹh-mark', (FRIEDRICH WILHELM LUDWIG,) a Prussian commander and diplomatist, served against the French in the campaigns from 1806 to 1813, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-general. He was employed successively on important missions to Saint Petersburg, Paris, and Vienna. Died in 1822.

Krusenstern, kroo'zẹn-stêrn', (ADAM JOHN,) a celebrated Russian navigator and traveller, born in Esthonia in 1770. In 1803 he sailed from Cronstadt, and during an absence of three years discovered the Orloff Islands, and obtained much information respecting countries previously little known. He brought out in 1810 his "Voyage around the World from 1803 to 1806," (3 vols., with an atlas and 104 plates,) which was translated into the principal European languages. He also published "Contributions to the Hydrography of the Greater Oceans," "Atlas of the Pacific Ocean," and other similar works. Krusenstern was the first Russian navigator who sailed around the world. Died in 1846.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale;" "Monthly Review" for June and July, 1814.

Krylof, kre-lof', or Kruilof, almost krwe-lof', (IVAN ANDREIEVITCH,) written also Krylow, Kriloff, and Krilov, a celebrated Russian fabulist, born at Moscow in 1768. At an early age he became familiar with the French language, and read with avidity the works of Molière, Racine, and Boileau. His first compositions were dramas, which were not favourably received. He was successively editor of "The Spirit Post," "The Spectator," and the "Petersburg Mercury," and in 1801 was appointed secretary to Prince Gallitsin. In 1808 he published a collection of fables, which met with great favour. He was elected to the Petersburg Academy in 1811, and subsequently received a large pension from the emperor Alexander, who also loaded him with honorary distinctions. His "Fables," which vie with those of La Fontaine in naïveté and humour, are the delight of all ages and classes in Russia, and many sentences in them have become proverbs. They have been translated into German, French, and Italian; but no version, it is thought, does justice to the original. Krylof was intimate with Pŏŏshkin, (Pushkin,) Karamzin, and other eminent writers. Died in 1844.

Küzing or Kützing, küt'sing, (Friedrich Traugott,) a German naturalist, born in Thuringia in 1807, published, among other works, "Elements of Philosophical Botany."

Kvasir, kvâ'sịr, [etymology unknown,] a mythic personage mentioned in the Norse legends. He was so wise and knowing that no one could ask him a question which he could not answer. He was, however, entrapped and slain by two dwarfs who had invited him to a feast. With his blood they mingled honey, and thus composed a mead which makes every one who drinks of it a skald, or wise man.

Kwang-Seu, ("Succession of Glory,") a Chinese emperor, born in 1871. On the death from smallpox of the emperor Tung-Che, (January 12, 1875,) Kwang-Seu, the infant grandson of the emperor Taoo-Kwang, (who died in 1850,) was selected as emperor. There were numbers of other princes nearer to the succession, but Chinese law requires that every heir must be younger than the person from whom he inherits: consequently Kwang-Seu, previously called Tsai-T'ien, was placed upon the throne, two aged princesses of the blood being made regents.

Kyau, von, fon kee'ŏw, (Friedrich Wilhelm,) Baron, a Prussian nobleman, celebrated for his wit and blunt honesty, was born in 1654. He was a favourite of Augustus II., King of Poland, who made him adjutant-general. Died in 1733.

Kŷd, (Thomas,) an English dramatist, flourished about 1580, a short time before Shakspeare. His only works extant are entitled "Cornelia, or Pompey the Great his fair Cornelia's Tragedy," "The First Part of Geronimo," and "The Spanish Tragedy, or Hieronymo is mad again." The last-named production displays uncommon power, and is supposed to have suggested to Shakspeare some parts of "Hamlet."

Kyffhäuser, kĭf'hoi'zẹr, an ancient palace (now in ruins) of the emperors of the Hohenstaufen dynasty, is situated on a high eminence near the village of Tilleda, in Germany. There is a popular tradition that at the Kyffhäuser, in a magnificent subterranean palace, Frederick Barbarossa ("Red-beard") exists in a state of enchantment, with his knights and squires seated round a stone table, through which his beard has grown. Once in one hundred years (or, as some say, in sixty years) he partially awakes from his enchanted sleep, and sends out some one to inquire how the time is passing. It is supposed that after a certain period he will awake and revisit his empire, and then a better time will prevail. One of Freiligrath's finest poems, entitled "Barbarossa's First Awaking," ("Barbarossa's erstes Erwachen,") has reference to the above tradition.

Kylian, kĭl'e-ân, (Jacob,) a Bohemian astronomer, born at Prague in 1714; died in 1774.

Kŷn'ạs-tọn or Kin'ạs-tọn, (Sir Francis,) an English poet, born in Shropshire in 1587, translated Chaucer's "Troilus and Cressida" into Latin, and was the author of a poem entitled "Leoline and Sydanis." He was the founder of the Museum Minervæ in Covent Garden. Died in 1642.

Kyper, kee'pẹr, (Albrecht,) a German medical writer, born at Königsberg about 1605. He became first physician to the Prince of Orange, and professor of medicine at Leyden in 1648. Died in 1655.

Kypke, kĭp'kẹh, (Georg David,) a German Orientalist, born in Pomerania in 1724, wrote "Observationes Sacræ in Novi Fœderis Libros," (1755.) Died in 1779.

Kyrle, kẹrl, (John,) an English benefactor, eulogized by Pope in the verses on the Man of Ross, was born about 1664. He was a native or resident of Ross, in Herefordshire, where he built a church and endowed a hospital. He owned an estate of £500 a year. Died in 1754, aged ninety.

* It may be proper to observe that in India churning is usually performed by causing a body, termed the churn-stick, to revolve rapidly in the cream or milk, by means of a string, in the same manner as a drill is made to revolve. In some of the Hindoo pictures of the churning of the ocean, the gods are represented as standing on one side of Mount Mandâra, and the Asurs on the other, both grasping in their hands the serpent Sesha, which is wound round the mountain. This rests upon the back of the tortoise, (Vishnu.) At the same time, the preserving deity, in consequence of his ubiquitous character, is seen standing among the gods and grasping Sesha, and also as dancing on the top of Mandâra. (See Plate 49 in Moor's "Hindu Pantheon.")

† Called Bikh in some of the modern Hindoo dialects.

‡ The signification of the name of Kuvêra has doubtless allusion to the fact that, to those engaged in the pursuit of wealth, it usually seems to come with a very slow and hobbling pace. In like manner the Plutus of the Greeks was represented as not only blind, (because he bestowed his favours with so little discernment,) but lame, because he seemed to come so slowly and reluctantly to those who sought him.

Labédoyère or La Bédoyère, de, dęh lă'bă'dwă'-yaiR', (CHARLES ANGÉLIQUE HUCHET,) COUNT, a French general, noted for graceful manners and chivalrous spirit, was born in Paris in 1786. He became aide-de-camp to Marshal Lannes in 1808. At Essling, in 1809, he was wounded by the side of Lannes, who was killed at the same time. He was aide-de-camp to Eugène Beauharnais in 1812, and distinguished himself at the Moskwa and Berezina. In 1814 he accepted from Louis XVIII. the command of a regiment stationed at Grenoble. He was one of the first officers that in 1815 joined the standard of Napoleon, who raised him to the rank of general of division; and he was one of the last to leave the field at the battle of Waterloo. Having been arrested in Paris and tried by court-martial, he was shot, in 1815.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Lā'be-o, (QUINTUS ANTISTIUS,) a Roman jurist, who flourished about 50 B.C. He fought for Brutus at Philippi, and, after the battle was lost, died by his own hand. His son, QUINTUS or MARCUS ANTISTIUS LABEO, was a more eminent jurist, a man of great learning, and an inflexible republican. He lived during the reign of Augustus, to whom he sometimes expressed his mind with boldness. He was the founder or head of a school of law, and was the rival of Capito. He wrote Commentaries on the Twelve Tables, and many treatises, extracts from which are preserved in the Digest. Labeo and Capito are styled "ornaments of Peace" ("decora Pacis") by Tacitus. The disciples of Labeo were called Proculiani, from Proculus, his successor.

Laberge, de, dęh lă'bąRzh', (CHARLES AUGUSTE,) an excellent French landscape-painter, born in Paris in 1805. He represented human nature with surprising fidelity in a picture of a "Diligence passing through a Village and announcing the Revolution of 1830." His "Country Physician" (1832) is called his master-piece. His works are finished very minutely, without impairing the general effect. Died in 1842.

Labergerie, de, dẹh lȧ'bĕrzh're', (JEAN BAPTISTE ROUGIER,) BARON, an eminent French agriculturist, born in Touraine in 1759. He published several approved historical works on the agriculture of the ancient Greeks, Romans, and Gauls, also treatises on Practical Agriculture. Died in 1836.

La-be'rĭ-us, (DECIMUS,) a Roman knight, distinguished as a writer of mimes, was born about 107 B.C. In the year 45 Cæsar signified a wish that he should act his mimes in public. He reluctantly complied, such practice being deemed degrading, and acquitted himself with credit, at the same time availing himself of the opportunity to turn his wit against the dictator. The prologue which he spoke on this occasion has been preserved, and is much admired. Only small fragments of his works are extant. Died in 43 B.C.

Labiche, lȧ'bèsh', (EUGÈNE MARIN,) a French dramatic author, born at Paris, May 5, 1815. He studied at the Collège Bourbon and at the law-school, but became a news-reporter for the small journals. He attained great success as a writer of eccentric and extravagant comedies, farces, and vaudevilles. In 1880 he was chosen to the Academy. His plays, more than one hundred in number, were in many instances prepared by other writers with his assistance, the originality and extravagance being in most cases his own. Among his best-known works are "Le Chapeau de Paille d'Italie," (1851,) and "Le Voyage de M. Perrichon." Died 1888.

La-bĭ-e'nus, (QUINTUS,) was a son of Titus, noticed below. He commanded an army of Parthians which defeated the forces of Mark Antony in Cilicia. Having been captured by the Romans, he was put to death in 39 B.C. His brother, TITUS LABIENUS, was an eloquent orator, and an enemy of Augustus Cæsar. He died in 12 A.D.

Labienus, (TITUS,) a Roman general, born 98 B.C., was chosen tribune of the people in 63, and prætor a few years later. About 60 B.C. he became lieutenant of Cæsar. He was the ablest general that served under Cæsar in the conquest of Gaul, where he gained victories over the Treviri. He abandoned his late chief at the passage of the Rubicon, and took arms for Pompey and the senate in 49 B.C. After the battle of Pharsalia he commanded in Africa, and was killed in the battle of Munda, in Spain, in 45 B.C.

Labillardière or La Billardière, de, dẹh lȧ'be'yȧR'-de-ȧir', (JACQUES JULIEN HOUTON,) a French botanist, born at Alençon in 1755. After he had explored Cyprus, Syria, and Mount Lebanon as a botanist, he was employed as naturalist in the expedition which was sent in search of La Pérouse in 1791. Having returned to Paris, he published two valuable works, viz., "Narrative of a Voyage in Search of La Pérouse," (1800,) and a "Flora of New Holland," (1804–06.) The former has enriched the various branches of natural history. He was a member of the Institute. Died in 1834.

See P. FLOURENS, "Éloge de J. J. de Labillardière," 1837.

Labitte, lȧ'bĕt', (CHARLES,) a French critic, born at Château-Thierry in 1816, became professor of foreign literature at Rennes in 1840. He wrote for the "Revue des Deux Mondes" able articles on M. J. Chénier and other authors. Died in 1845. Two volumes of his "Études littéraires" were published in 1846.

Lablache, lȧ'blȧsh', (LOUIS,) a celebrated singer and actor, born of French parentage in Naples in 1794. He performed many seasons in Paris and London. His voice embraced two full octaves; it was firm and sonorous, powerful and expressive. He was successful both in the serious and comic opera. It is stated that he gave lessons in music to Queen Victoria. "He has given form and life," says M. D'Ortigue, "to the immortal types traced by musicians of genius; he has delighted civilized Europe for nearly half a century as a tragedian full of dignity and as an inimitable buffoon." Died in 1858.

Laboulaye, lȧ'boo'lȧ', (ÉDOUARD RENÉ LEFÉBURE,) a French jurist and historical writer, born in Paris in 1811. He acquired a high reputation by his writings, among which are a "History of the Law of Landed Property in Europe," (1839,) a "History of the United States of America," (3 vols., 1855,) and an ingenious and witty work entitled "Paris in America." He translated into French several of the works of Dr. Channing, (1853.) In 1845 he was chosen a member of the Academy of Inscriptions. He was a warm friend of the Union during the great civil war, (1861–65,) and was a Liberal in French politics. Died May 24, 1883.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

Labourdonnaie or La Bourdonnaie, de, dẹh lȧ′boor′do′nȧ′, (ANNE FRANÇOIS AUGUSTIN,) COUNT, a French general, born at Guérande in 1747. In 1792 he was made a general, and, having obtained command of the army of the North, was denounced by Dumouriez for obstructing his operations in Belgium, and was recalled. He afterwards commanded the army of the Pyrenees. Died in November, 1793.

Labourdonnaie, de, (FRANÇOIS RÉGIS,) COUNT, a French legislator, born at Angers in 1767. In 1815 he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies, where for about fifteen years he was one of the chief orators of the extreme royalists. He obtained the portfolio of the interior in the Polignac ministry in 1829, but resigned about the close of that year. Died in 1839.

Labourdonnais, de, (MAHÉ.) See MAHÉ.

Labourdonnais, de, dẹh lȧ′boor′do′nȧ′, (MAHÉ, mȧ′ȧ′,) a Frenchman, surnamed "The King of Chess," was born in 1795. After the death of Philidor he was probably the most skilful chess-player in France. He wrote a "Life of Mahé de Labourdonnais," (his grandfather.) Died in 1840.

Laboureur, Le, lẹh lȧ′boo′rur′, (JEAN,) a French priest, whose works have thrown light on the history of France, was born at Montmorency in 1623. He became one of the almoners of the king. He published "Monuments of Illustrious Persons," (1641,) "Memoirs of Michel de Castelnau," (1659,) and other works. Died in 1675.

Labrador, lȧ-brȧ-dôr′, (JUAN,) a Spanish painter of the Seville school, was born in Estremadura. He painted flowers and fruits with great success. His works are highly prized in Spain. Died in 1600, at an advanced age.

Labrousse, de, dẹh lȧ′brooss′, (CLOTILDE SUZANNE de Courcelles—dẹh koor′sel′,) a French enthusiast, born in Périgord in 1747. She professed to be a prophetess. In the Revolution she advocated the popular cause. Died in 1821.

La Brousse, de, (NICOLAS,) Comte de Verteillac, (dẹh vĕr′tȧ′yȧk′,) a French general, born in 1648, was killed near Mons in 1693. Louis XIV. said, "I have lost in the Count of Verteillac the best officer of infantry that I have had since Turenne."

La Brune, de, dẹh lȧ brün, (JEAN,) a French Protestant minister and writer, lived about 1690–1720.

La Brunerie, de, dẹh lȧ brün′re′, (GUILLAUME,) Vicomte Dode, a French general, born in Isère in 1775. He had the chief command of the engineers of the army which invaded Spain in 1823, and directed the fortifications of Paris, (1840–45.) He was made a marshal of France in 1847. Died in 1851.

Lacarry, lȧ′kȧ′re′, (GILLES,) a learned French Jesuit and historian, born in the diocese of Castres in 1605, was for many years rector of the College of Cahors. He published several esteemed historical works, among which is a "History of Rome from Julius Cæsar to Constantine I.," (1671.) Died in 1684.

Lacaussade, lȧ′kō′sȧd′, (AUGUSTE,) a French poet and critic, born in the Isle of Bourbon in 1820. He made a good version of Ossian's poems, (1842,) and became secretary to M. Sainte-Beuve. In 1852 he published "Poëmes et Paysages," ("Poems and Landscapes.")

Lacaze, de, dẹh lȧ′kȧz′, (LOUIS,) a French medical writer, born in Béarn in 1703. Among his works is "Idée de l'Homme physique et moral," ("Ideal of the Physical and Moral Man," 1755.) Died in 1765.

Lacépède, de, dẹh lȧ′sȧ′pȧd′, (BERNARD GERMAIN ETIENNE DE LA VILLE,) COUNT, an eminent French naturalist, born at Agen in 1756. He was carefully educated at home by his father, who was of a distinguished family, and in early youth chose natural history as his favourite study and Buffon as his model. Having sent to Buffon an account of some experiments on electricity and received a complimentary answer, he went to Paris in 1777, and formed an intimacy with that naturalist and Daubenton. He published an "Essay on Electricity" in 1781, and soon after became the favourite pupil of Buffon, who selected him to continue his "Natural History." In 1785 Lacépède was appointed curator and sub-demonstrator in the Cabinet du Roi. He published, as a sequel to Buffon's work, in 1788, a "Natural History of Oviparous Quadrupeds and Serpents," which was commended by Cuvier. In 1791 he entered the Legislative Assembly as a moderate friend of the new régime, and during the reign of terror found refuge in the country. He obtained a chair of zoology in the Museum of Natural History in 1795, and was admitted into the Institute in 1796. His "Natural History of Fishes" (6 vols. 4to, 1798–1803) is elegant in style, but defective in philosophy. Having been chosen president of the senate in 1801, grand chancellor of the legion of honour in 1803, and minister of state in 1804, he was very assiduous in the performance of his public duties. His "Natural History of Cetacea" (2 vols., 1804) is called his best work. After the restoration he was made a peer of France. Died in 1825.

Lacordaire, lä'kor'dâr', (JEAN BAPTISTE HENRI,) a celebrated French preacher, and founder of a new order of Dominicans, was born at Recey-sur-Ource (Côte d'Or) in 1802. He was educated for the law, which he renounced in 1823 for the church, having been converted from Voltairian views by the "Essay on Indifference" of Lamennais. In 1830 he was associated with Lamennais and Montalembert as an editor of the "Avenir," which was ultramontane in religion but liberal or radical in politics. His unity and co-operation with Lamennais ceased in 1832, after a visit to Rome with his two friends above named, and after the pope had denounced the "Avenir." In 1835 the archbishop opened to him the pulpit of Notre-Dame, Paris, where he attracted immense crowds by the novel and brilliant style of his sermons, in which he availed himself freely of the various interests and excitements of the time. He became a Dominican friar in 1840, and published a "Life of Saint Dominic." In 1848 he was elected to the Constituent Assembly; but he resigned his seat in May of that year, having failed as a parliamentary speaker. He afterwards preached in Paris and other cities. He published "Considerations on the Philosophic System of Lamennais," (1834,) "Sermons (Conférences) at Notre-Dame," (3 vols., 1835–50,) "Letter on the Holy See," (1838,) and other works. In 1859 or 1860 he was elected to the French Academy in place of De Tocqueville. Died in November, 1861.

Lacretelle, de, deh lä'kreh-tĕl', (JEAN CHARLES DOMINIQUE,) a popular French historian, born at Metz in 1766. He was in Paris during the Revolution, and was a zealous partisan of the moderate Constitutionalists. After the fall of Robespierre he became one of the chiefs of the jeunesse dorée, and gained distinction as an eloquent writer and editor of a political journal. On the 18th Fructidor, 1797, he was arrested on the charge of being a royalist, and imprisoned twenty-three months. He published a "History of the French Revolution," (5 vols., 1801–6,) which obtained great success, a "History of France since the Restoration," (3 vols., 1829–35,) and many other works on French history. Among his best productions is a "History of France during the Eighteenth Century," (6 vols., 1808,) and "The National Convention," (3 vols., 1825.) He was admitted into the French Academy in 1811, and was professor of history at the Faculty of Letters from 1809 to 1848. In 1827 he was the prime mover of a protest which the French Academy made against a proposed law to subvert the freedom of the press. Died in 1855.

Lævinus, (PUBLIUS VALERIUS,) a Roman general, who was consul in 280 B.C. He obtained the chief command in the war against Pyrrhus and the Tarentines. His army was defeated by Pyrrhus in a great battle on the Siris, near Heraclea, in 280 B.C.

Lævinus, lȧ-vee'nus, (TORRENTIUS,) called also Vander Beken, vȧn dĕr bā'kĕn, a Flemish prelate, born at Ghent about 1525, was distinguished as a Latin poet. He founded a college of Jesuits at Louvain, and became Bishop of Mechlin. Died in 1595.

Lævius, lee've-us, a Latin poet, of whom little is known. He lived in the first century before Christ, and wrote "Erotopægnia."

Lafabrique, lȧ'fȧ'brĕk', (NICOLAS,) a Flemish painter, born at Namur; died at Liege in 1736.

La Fage, lȧ fȧzh, (RAIMOND,) a French designer and engraver, born at Lisle (Albigeois) about 1650, studied and worked at Rome and at Paris. He was renowned for boldness of touch and facility of execution. The pen was his favourite instrument in design. He left many etchings. His habits were very intemperate. Died about 1690.

La Fage, de, dẹh lȧ fȧzh, (JUSTE ADRIEN LENOIR,) a French musician, composer, and writer on music, born at Paris in 1801. In 1828 he produced a comic opera, "I Creditori," which was moderately successful. But he is best known for his works on music, "The Complete Manual of Music," (1836–38,) and "General History of Music." Died March 8, 1862.

La Faille, de, dẹh lȧ fȧl or fȧ'yẹ, (CLÉMENT,) a French naturalist, born at La Rochelle in 1718; died in 1782.

Lafaist. See LAFAYE.

La Fare, de, dẹh lȧ fȧr, (CHARLES AUGUSTE,) MARQUIS, a French littérateur, born at Valgorge in 1644. He served several campaigns in the army, (1667–74,) and became a friend of Turenne. Besides some trifling poetical pieces, he wrote "Memoirs and Reflections on the Principal Events of the Reign of Louis XIV.," (1715,) which is commended. Died in 1712.

La Farge, lȧ fȧrzh, (JOACHIM,) a French financier, born in Paris about 1750, originated a system of tontine which is called by his name. Died about 1825.

Lafarge, la-fȧrj', (JOHN,) an American artist, born in New York city about 1840. He is one of the best landscape-painters in the United States, and is noted for his flower-pieces and water-colour pictures. His strongest quality is exhibited in the masterly and expressive use of colour. Among his noted works are "Paradise at Newport," "Christ and Nicodemus," a cartoon sketch, and the frescos of Trinity Church, Boston. Comparatively few of his paintings are free from technical faults, but their popularity is based upon high yet often subtile and indefinable excellences of conception and execution.

La Farge, (MARIE CAPPELLE,) a Frenchwoman, notorious for her crimes, was born in Picardy in 1816. She was the daughter of a colonel of artillery, and was married in 1838 to M. La Farge, who died soon after, it was supposed, from the effects of poison administered by his wife. About the same time she was accused of having stolen from one of her friends some diamonds of great value. The trial which followed was of the most exciting kind, several eminent chemists having declared, after an examination of the remains, that there were no marks of poison, while M. Orfila asserted that arsenic was present. Madame La Farge was condemned to imprisonment for life, but after twelve years she was released, on account of ill health, and died in 1852.

See "Mémoires de Marie Cappelle Veuve La Farge," by herself 4 vols., 1840; "Edinburgh Review" for July, 1842.

La Farina, lȧ fȧ-ree'nȧ, (GIUSEPPE,) an Italian lawyer and historical writer, born at Messina in 1815. He founded several liberal journals, which were successively suppressed by the government. He afterwards settled at Florence, where he found more liberty, and published a democratic anti-papal journal, "L'Alba." He took a prominent part in the unsuccessful revolution in Sicily in 1848, after which he again became an exile. Among his works are a "History of Italy from 1815 to 1850," (6 vols.,) and a "History of the Revolution of Sicily in 1848–49," (2 vols.) Died in 1863.

Lafaye, lȧ'fȧ', (ANTOINE,) a French Protestant minister, born at Châteaudun, became professor of theology at Geneva in 1584. He wrote several theological works, and a "Life of Beza," (1606.) Died in 1615.

Lafaye or Lafaist, lȧ'fȧ', (PIERRE BENJAMIN,) a French philologist, born in the department of Yonne in 1808. His chief works are "French Synonymes," (1841,) crowned by the Institute, and a "Dictionary of the Synonymes of the French Language." Died in 1867.

Lafaye, de, dẹh lȧ'fȧ', (JEAN ÉLIE,) an able French engineer, born at Vienne in 1671. He served in the army many years as engineer, and made discoveries in the science of war. Died in 1718.

Lafaye, de, (JEAN FRANÇOIS,) a French diplomatist, distinguished for his wit and accomplishments, brother of the preceding, was born at Vienne in 1674. He was a member of the French Academy. Died in 1731.

La Fayette or Lafayette, de, dẹh lȧ'fȧ'ẹt', (GEORGE WASHINGTON,) the only son of General La Fayette, was born in 1779. He entered the army young, and served in Italy about 1796. As aide-de-camp of General Grouchy, he made the campaigns of Austria, Prussia, and Poland, (1805–07.) He was elected to the Chamber of Deputies in 1822, and again in 1827, by the voters of Seine-et-Marne, whom he continued to represent until 1848. In politics he was an advanced liberal. Died in 1849.

La Fayette, de, (GILBERT,) a French general, born about 1380. He fought for the dauphin Charles against the English, and became a marshal of France in 1420. He was afterwards one of the chief counsellors of Charles VII., and contributed to the victory of Joan of Arc at Orléans in 1429. He aided in expelling the English from Normandy in 1449. Died in 1462.

See "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

La Fayette, de, (LOUISE,) a French lady, born in 1616, was a daughter of Count Jean de la Fayette. She gained the affection of Louis XIII. about 1634, and encouraged him to become more independent of Richelieu. She entered a convent about 1636. Died in 1665.

La Fayette or Lafayette, de, (MARIE JEAN PAUL Roch Yves Gilbert Motier—rosh ẻv zhẽl'bair' mo'-te-ȧ',) MARQUIS, an illustrious French statesman and patriot, was born at Chavagnac, September 6, 1757. His father, who was a marquis and maréchal-de-camp, was killed at the battle of Minden in 1757. After leaving the Collége Du Plessis, in Paris, he married in 1774 Mdlle. d'Ayen, a daughter of the Duke of Ayen. He was the heir of an immense fortune, and had brilliant prospects at court, when, with generous enthusiasm for liberty, he offered his services to the new-born republic of America. Silas Deane, commissioner of the United States in Paris, accepted his offer, and promised him the grade of major-general, which was confirmed by the American Congress. In the spring of 1777 he arrived in the United States, and in the same year took part in the battle of the Brandywine, where he was wounded. He gained the favour and confidence of Washington, and received the thanks of Congress for his conduct at Monmouth in 1778. The French court having recognized the independence of the United States, La Fayette recrossed the ocean in 1779 and returned with material aid to the scene of war. He commanded the advanced guard of Washington in 1780, and contributed to the decisive victory of Yorktown, (1781,) where the war was virtually ended.

On his return to France, with a prestige magnified by distance, he was received with unbounded applause, which reanimated or confirmed his devotion to the cause of liberty. In 1787 he advocated the rights of the French Protestants and various reforms in the government. His principal parliamentary act in the States-General of 1789 was his Declaration of the Rights of Man, which was adopted by that body. In that year he was chosen by acclamation commandant of the Parisian militia, to which he gave the name of the National Guard. At this period he was the popular favourite of the nation. "The federation of 1790," says Lamartine, "was the apogee of La Fayette. He overshadowed on that day both the king and the Assembly." ("History of the Girondists.") Aiming to reconcile his loyalty to the king with his duty to the cause of freedom, he acted with the Feuillants, the friends of constitutional monarchy. In the maintenance of order he often risked his life, and he enforced martial law against the insurgents in the Champ-de-Mars in July, 1791, soon after the arrest of the king at Varennes. Before the end of that year he resigned his command, and was a candidate for the mayoralty of Paris; but the intrigues of the queen and court, who hated or feared him, decided the election in favour of Péthion, who was a radical revolutionist. The large majority of Péthion showed that the star of La Fayette was declining. In the winter of 1791–92 he was chosen commander of one of the three armies, and, war having been declared against Austria in April, he directed some small operations on the frontier of Flanders, at the same time striving, without success, to defeat the Jacobins at Paris. Indignant at the attack on the Tuileries, (June 20, 1792,) La Fayette went, with a single officer, to Paris, and, in a short harangue before the bar of the Assembly, demanded the punishment of the offenders. "In this attempt to act as dictator," says Lamartine, "the motive was generous, the peril great, but the means null." Returning to the army, he devised a plan to save the king by transferring him from the capital to his camp; but the court rejected the offer.

The insurrection of August 10 gave the ascendency to the republicans, who deprived La Fayette of his command. He then fled towards Holland, intending to emigrate to the United States, but was arrested by the Austrians and detained in the dungeons of Neiss and Olmütz, where he was treated with much rigour. In a treaty with Austria in 1797, Bonaparte insisted on his liberation, which was effected in September of that year. Having passed about two years in Holland, he returned to France in 1800, and, refusing several offers of public employment under Bonaparte, maintained his political consistency in retirement at La Grange. Some one having complained that La Fayette censured the government, the First Consul replied, "Let him alone: he will not say more against me than he has expressed openly before me."

In the Chamber of Deputies in 1815, he opposed the claims of Bonaparte and of the Bourbons, and wished to rally round the standard of 1789 for "liberty, equality, and order." After the restoration of the Bourbons he spoke frequently in the Chamber in opposition to the ministry. In 1824 he revisited the scene of his youthful exploits, where he was received with cordial demonstrations of honour and gratitude, and passed about a year in a triumphal progress through the twenty-four States of the Union. The Congress of the United States voted $200,000 in recompense for his services in the war of independence. The arbitrary measures of Charles X. again roused him to political action. He took a prominent part in the revolution of 1830, as the chief of the popular camp in Paris, and president of the commission which exercised a sort of dictatorship after the expulsion of Charles X. He was also chosen commander of all the National Guards of France. He acquiesced in the accession of Louis Philippe, which Lamartine thinks he might easily have prevented by proclaiming a republic. On this occasion he said to the new king, "You know that I am a republican, and that I regard the Constitution of the United States as the most perfect that ever existed." He died May 20, 1834, leaving one son and several daughters. Perhaps no man ever lived through such vicissitudes of fortune, and such severe trials of his virtue, with a character more free from just reproach than La Fayette. The high-toned consistency of his conduct is expressed in the assertion of Madame de Staël, "that you could certainly predict what he would do in every contingency."

La Fayette, de, (MARIE MADELEINE Pioche de la Vergne—pē'osh' dẹh lȧ vȧrn̄,) COUNTESS, a popular French authoress, born in Paris in 1634, was eminently beautiful. She married the Count de la Fayette in 1655, and her house became the resort of La Fontaine, La Rochefoucauld, Ménage, and other eminent authors. She wrote two successful novels, "Zayde," (1670,) and "The Princess of Cleves," (1678,) which were the first French works of fiction that truly represented the manners of the higher classes. She left also "Memoirs of the French Court" for the years 1688 and 1689, (1731,) and a few other works. Died in 1693.

La Fayette, de, (OSCAR,) a son of George W., noticed above, was born in Paris in 1816. He served in the army in Africa, and obtained the rank of captain. In 1846 he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies, and in 1848 to the Constituent Assembly, in which he voted with the republicans. Died March 26, 1881.

Laferrière or La Ferrière, lȧ'fȧ're-air', (LOUIS FIRMIN JULIEN,) a French jurist, and a member of the Institute, was born at Jonzac in 1798. His principal work is a "History of the Civil Law of Rome and of French Law," (6 vols., 1846–53.) Died in 1861.

La Ferrière, de, dẹh lȧ fȧ're-air', (LOUIS MARIE,) COUNT, born at Redon in 1776, became a general of division. He lost a leg at Craonne in 1814. Napoleon left him a legacy of 100,000 francs. Died in 1834.

La Ferté-Imbault, de, dẹh lȧ fẽr'tȧ' ăn'bō', (MARIE THÉRÈSE GEOFFRIN,) MARQUISE, a literary French lady, born in Paris in 1715, was a daughter of the well-known Madame de Geoffrin. She was trained up in the society of such men as Fontenelle and Montesquieu, who were habitués of her mother's salon. Her moral or pious principles caused her to close her door against D'Alembert and the other Encyclopædists. She was grand maîtresse of the order of Lanturelus, designed for literary diversion, and composed several volumes of moral maxims. Died in 1791.

La Ferté-Senneterre, de, dẹh lȧ fẽr'tȧ' sẽn'tair' (HENRI,) DUC, a French marshal, born in 1600, commanded a wing at the battle of Rocroy, (1645.) He became a marshal of France in 1651, after which Turenne and he recovered Bar, Arras, and other towns which the Prince of Condé had captured. Died in 1681.

La Feuillade. See FEUILLADE, DE LA.

Laffitte, lȧ'fẽt', (JACQUES,) an eminent French financier and liberal statesman, born at Bayonne in 1767, was the son of a carpenter. In 1788 he entered as clerk the banking-house of Perregaux at Paris. He became a partner about 1802, and the head of the firm in 1809. In the latter year he was chosen governor of the Bank of France. The great fortune which he had acquired was freely offered for the defence of Paris from the invaders in 1814, and for the restoration of the public credit in 1815. Napoleon deposited with him 5,000,000 francs just before his departure to Saint Helena, with the expression of perfect confidence in his honesty. In 1816 he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies, in which he acted with the Liberal opposition and spoke with ability on financial questions. "Placed in the vanguard of the defenders of the Charter," says M. de Loménie, "as popular by his opinions as by his princely munificence, the opulent banker beheld himself surrounded by all the notabilities of the press and the tribune." He took an active part in the dethronement of Charles X. in 1830, and used his influence in favour of Louis Philippe, to whom in a critical hour he wrote, "No more hesitation! Choose between a crown and a passport." He entered the first ministry of the new reign as minister without a portfolio. This ministry having been speedily dissolved, Laffitte, on the 3d of November, 1830, became prime minister (président du conseil) and minister of finance. Failing to command a majority in the chamber, he resigned in March, 1831. The financial crisis which followed ruined his fortune, which had been reduced by large donations to the popular cause in 1830. A national subscription relieved him from embarrassment about 1833. Died in 1844.

Laffon de Ladébat, lȧ'fôn' dẹh lȧ'dȧ'bȧ', (ANDRÉ DANIEL,) a French financier, born at Bordeaux in 1746, was a merchant in early life. He was a moderate member of the Assembly in 1791, and of the Council of Elders in 1795. The coup d'état of September 4, 1797, sent him as an exile to Guiana. After his return to France he published several treatises on finance, economy, etc. He was one of the founders of the Protestant Bible Society in 1818. Died in 1829.

See THIERS, "History of the French Revolution;" HAAG, "La France protestante."

Lafitau, lȧ'fe'tō', (JOSEPH FRANÇOIS,) a French Jesuit, born at Bordeaux. Having been for many years a missionary in Canada, he returned to France, and published "Manners of the American Savages compared with the Manners of Primitive Ages," and two other works. Died in 1740.

Lafitau, (PIERRE FRANÇOIS,) a French priest and writer, born at Bordeaux in 1685. He wrote a "Life of Clement XI.," (1752,) and other works. He became Bishop of Sisteron in 1719. Died in 1764.

Lafite, lȧ'fēt', (MARIE ÉLISABETH Bouée—boo'ȧ',) a French authoress, born in Paris about 1750. She wrote several juvenile books, among which are "Moral Conversations and Tales," etc., (1781,) often reprinted. Died in 1794.

Lafitte, lȧ-fit' or lȧ'fēt', (JEAN,) a notorious French privateer, born about 1780, became about 1813 the leader of a band of pirates who established themselves at Grande Terre, in Barataria Bay, in the Gulf of Mexico. In 1814 he was offered a large sum of money, and a commission in the navy, on condition of his assisting the British in their attack on New Orleans. He refused these proposals, and offered his services to defend Louisiana on condition of pardon to himself and followers, which offer was accepted. The time and circumstances of his death are unknown. The adventures of Lafitte have formed the subject of several tales and romances.

Lafolie, lȧ'fo'le', (CHARLES JEAN,) a French littérateur, born in Paris in 1780, published "Notices of the Public Monuments, Palaces, Museums, Colleges, etc. of Paris," (1820.) Died in 1824.

Lafolie, (LOUIS GUILLAUME,) a French chemist, born at Rouen in 1739. He discovered the yellow dye extracted from gaude, (dyer's weed,) and wrote an imaginative work called the "Philosopher without Pretension," ("Philosophe sans Prétention," etc., 1775.) Died in 1780.

Lafon, lȧ'fôn', (JEAN BERNARD,) a prolific French author, known by the literary name of MARY LAFON. He was born at Lafrançaise in 1812. He wrote books on the troubadours, on the Provençal language, etc., besides a "History of the South of France," "History of the French Cities," many plays, some romances, and the autobiographical "Cinquante Ans de la Vie littéraire." His works comprise more than fifty volumes. Died near Montauban in 1884.

Lafon, lȧ'fôn', (PIERRE,) a famous French tragic actor, born in Périgord in 1775, made a successful début in Paris in 1800, and was considered by his admirers a rival of Talma. Died in 1846.

Lafons, de, deh lȧ'fôn', (FRANÇOIS JOSEPH ALEXANDRE,) Baron de Mellicocq, a French botanist and antiquary, born at Noyon, Oise, in 1802.

Lafont, lȧ'fôn', (CHARLES PHILIPPE,) a popular musician, born in Paris in 1781, was appointed in 1809 first violinist to the emperor Alexander of Russia, and on his return to Paris in 1815 filled the same office at the royal chapel. Died in 1839.

Lafont, (PIERRE CHÉRI,) a French actor, born at Bordeaux in 1801. Died April 18, 1873.

Lafont, de, deh lȧ'fôn', (JOSEPH,) a French dramatist, born in Paris in 1686, wrote successful comedies, among which was "The Festivals of Thalia," ("Les Fêtes de Thalie," 1714.) Died in 1725.

Lafontaine, lȧ'fôn'tȧn', (AUGUST HEINRICH JULIUS,) a popular novelist, of French origin, born at Brunswick about 1758. Having taken holy orders, he was employed as pastor or professor at Halle. He published, in German, a great number of novels, which had a temporary success and were translated into French. Among them are "The Singular Man," ("Der Sonderling,") "The Family De Halden," and "Agnes and Bertha," (1818.) Died at Halle in 1831. His style is easy and agreeable, but his sentimentality is considered excessive.

See JOHANN G. GRUBER, "A. Lafontaine's Leben und Wirken," 1833; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale;" "Foreign Quarterly Review" for February, 1834.

La Fontaine or Lafontaine, de, deh lȧ'fôn'tȧn', (JEAN,) a famous French fabulist, born at Château-Thierry, July 8, 1621, was the most popular French poet of his time. He was remarkable for an easy, careless, and indolent temper, and passed the age of twenty-one before he manifested his poetical genius. He married Marie Héricart to please his father, who procured for him the office of master of waters and forests; but he soon sold his office and separated from his wife. The Duchess de Bouillon, pleased with his first literary efforts, became his patroness and took him to Paris. He received a pension from Fouquet, and about 1662 composed an admirable elegy on the fall of that minister. He enjoyed for about twenty years the hospitality of Madame Sablière, a lady of Paris, who generously protected him from the effects of his improvidence and incapacity for business. His first tales appeared in 1664, and six books of Fables in 1668. Ten years later, he produced the last six books of those inimitable works. At the death of Colbert (1683,) La Fontaine and Boileau were rival candidates for the place which he left vacant in the French Academy; and the former was successful. Molière and La Fontaine are reckoned the two most original writers of the brilliant age of Louis XIV. Many anecdotes are related of his simplicity, naïveté, and absence of mind. "His lines," says Hallam, "have a proverbial truth and a humour of expression which render them constantly applicable. . . . Many of his fables are admirable: the grace of the poetry, the happy inspiration that seems to have dictated the turns of expression, place him in the first rank among fabulists." ("Introduction to the Literature of Europe.") He died in Paris in April, 1695, having expressed penitence for the licentious passages in his tales.

La Fontenelle or Lafontenelle, de, deh lȧ fôNt'nēl', (ARMAND DÉSIRÉ,) a French antiquary and biographer, born in Poitou in 1784. Among his works are a "History of Oliver de Clisson," (2 vols., 1826,) and the "Life and Correspondence of Du Plessis-Mornay," (with Auguis, 12 vols., 1822–42.) Died in 1847.

Lafosse, lȧ'foss', (PHILIPPE ÉTIENNE,) a French veterinary physician, wrote "The Farrier's Guide," (1766,) and a "Manual of Veterinary Medicine," (1803.) Died in 1820.

Lafosse or La Fosse, de, deh lȧ foss, (ANTOINE,) a French dramatist and poet, born in Paris in 1653, was accounted by some the first tragic poet of his time. He produced, besides other dramas, "Polyxène," (1686,) and "Manlius Capitolinus," (1698,) a tragedy, which is highly praised by La Harpe. Died in 1708.

Lafosse, de, (CHARLES,) a French historical painter of high reputation, born in Paris in 1636, was an uncle of the preceding. He studied under Lebrun, and in Rome. He was employed by Louis XIV. to adorn the Trianon and the Hôtel des Invalides, the frescoed dome of which is called his master-piece. He was admitted into the Academy of Painting in 1683, when he exhibited the "Abduction of Proserpine." Died in 1716.

Lagny, de, dĕh lăn'ye', (THOMAS FANTET,) a French mathematician, born at Lyons in 1660. He removed to Paris in 1678, was admitted into the Academy of Sciences in 1695, and chosen professor of hydrography at Rochefort in 1697. He was a Fellow of the Royal Society of London. He published, besides other ingenious treatises, "The Cubature of the Sphere," (1703,) "which," says Fontenelle, "would prove him to be a great geometer." Died in 1734.

Lagomarsini, lä-go-mar-see'nee, (GIROLAMO,) an eminent Italian philologist and Jesuit, born in 1698. He was professor of rhetoric in Florence for many years, and about 1750 became professor of Greek in the Roman College. He published Latin orations (1746) and epistles, a poem "On the Origin of Springs," ("De Origine Fontium," 1749,) and other works. Died in 1773.

Lagrange or La Grange, lä grŏnzh, (JOSEPH LOUIS,) one of the most eminent geometers of modern times, was born at Turin on the 25th of January, 1736. His parents were of French origin. He was educated in the College of Turin, where his mathematical genius was rapidly developed and was specially directed to the study of modern analysis. It has been said that all he learned seemed to be only a reminiscence of what he had before known. Having examined Euler's work on "Isoperimetrical Problems," he sent to the author in 1755 the first essays of his "Method of Variations," which alone would immortalize his name, and which he had invented to respond to the desire of Euler. About the age of nineteen he was chosen professor of mathematics in the military college of Turin. The first volume of the "Memoirs of the Academy of Turin" (1759) consisted chiefly of the admirable essays of Lagrange on the most important and difficult points of analysis and mechanics, such as the propagation of sound and the vibration of chords. He published in 1762 some applications of his great discovery, which was afterwards called the "Method of Variations." In 1764 he gained the prize offered by the French Academy of Sciences for a "Theory of the Libration of the Moon." Invited by Frederick the Great, he removed to Berlin in 1766, and was for twenty years director of the Berlin Academy of Sciences, which he enriched with numerous treatises on "Tautochronous Curves," "Numerical Equations," the "Integral Calculus," "Partial Differences," and on the most arduous questions of general astronomy and celestial mechanics. He was chosen a foreign associate of the Academy of Paris in 1772. The persuasion of Mirabeau and the offer of a pension from the king induced him to settle in Paris in 1787. He published in 1788 his magnificent work "La Mécanique analytique," ("Analytical Mechanics,") which is considered one of the master-pieces of the human intellect. His interest was vividly excited by the Revolution, in which, however, he took no active part. In 1792 he married Mademoiselle Lemonnier. He was the first professor of geometry in the Polytechnic School, founded about 1794; and his name was the first inscribed on the list of the members of the Institute, founded in 1795. Napoleon, who highly appreciated the great talents of one so incapable of intrigue and adulation, gave him the office of senator and the titles of count of the empire and grand officer of the legion of honour. He died in April, 1813. "Among the inventors who have most enlarged the boundaries of our knowledge," says La Place, "Newton and Lagrange appear to have possessed in the highest degree the power which, by the discovery of general principles, constitutes the true genius of science." "After Newton's discovery of the elliptic orbits of the planets," says Playfair, "Lagrange's discovery of their periodical inequalities is, without doubt, the noblest truth in physical astronomy; and, in respect of the doctrine of final causes, it may truly be regarded as the greatest of all."

La Grange, (N.,) a French littérateur, born in Paris in 1738, translated the great poem of Lucretius "De Rerum Natura," with notes, (1768,) and the works of Seneca, (7 vols., 1779.) The former passes for one of the best versions in the French language. Died in 1775.

La Grange or Lagrange, de, dĕh lä grŏnzh, (ADÉLAÏDE BLAISE FRANÇOIS LE LIÈVRE,) Marquis de Fourilles, born in Paris in 1766, became general of division in 1809. Died in 1833.

La Grange, de, (ADÉLAÏDE ÉDOUARD,) MARQUIS, a son of the preceding, and a member of the Institute, was born in Paris in 1796. He was an active member of the Chamber of Deputies from 1834 to 1848, and voted with the friends of Louis Napoleon in the Assembly of 1849. In 1852 he became a senator. He wrote, besides other works, treatises on numismatics. Died January 17, 1876.

La Grange, de, (AMAND CHARLES LOUIS LE LIÈVRE,) a French general, born in 1783, served with distinction under Napoleon I. Died July 31, 1864.

Lagrange, de, (JOSEPH,) COMTE, a French general, born in 1763; died in 1836.

La Grange, de, (JOSEPH DE CHANCEL,) a French dramatic and satiric poet, commonly called La Grange-Chancel, was born at Périgueux in 1676. His drama of "Jugurtha" was performed with success in 1694. He produced other tragedies, among which "Amasis" (1701) and "Ino and Melicerta" (1713) are called the best. He was imprisoned or exiled some years for three remarkable odes, named "Philippiques," (1720,) which were libellous satires against the Regent of France. "As a satiric poet," says the "Nouvelle Biographie Générale," "he has left a work which, in spite of its imperfections and crying injustice, is the monument of satire in France." Died in 1758.

Lagrené, de, dĕh lăgr'nà' or lä'grĕh-nà', (THÉODOSE MARIE MELCHIOR JOSEPH,) a French diplomatist, was born at Amiens in 1800. He went to Athens as minister in 1836, and to China in 1844. Died April 27, 1862.

Lagrénée, lä'grà'nà', (JEAN JACQUES,) a French historical painter, born in Paris in 1740. He worked in Paris with success, and reproduced antique paintings by incrustation on marble and glass. Died in 1821.

Lagrénée, (LOUIS JEAN FRANÇOIS,) called AINÉ, a French historical painter, brother of the preceding, was born in Paris in 1724. He was surnamed "the French Albano." He studied at Rome, became Academician in 1755, and for some time was first painter to the Empress of Russia. He afterwards worked in Paris. Died in 1805.

See RENOU, "Notice sur Lagrénée l'ainé," 1815.

La Guéronnière or Laguéronnière, de, dĕh lä gà'- ro'ne-air', (ARTHUR,) VICOMTE, a French political writer and Bonapartist, born in 1816. He became chief editor of Lamartine's new journal, the "Pays," in 1850. A dissension arose between him and Lamartine on the subject of a historical study on Louis Napoleon, which the former published in the "Pays," and which increased his reputation as a brilliant writer. He was elected a deputy in 1852, and appointed a councillor of state in 1854. His pamphlet entitled "Napoleon III. and England" (1858) produced a great sensation on both sides of the Channel. He became an editor of the "Constitutionnel." Died December 23, 1875.

Laguerre, lȧ-gair', (JEAN, commonly called JACK,) an English musician, painter, and engraver, born in London in 1700. He was the son of Louis Laguerre, a French painter who settled in England. Died in 1748.

Laguerre or La Guerre, lȧ'gair', (LOUIS,) a French painter, born in 1663, was a pupil of Le Brun. He went to England about 1684, and worked with or for Verrio. He painted "The Labours of Hercules" in Hampton Court Palace. Died in 1721.

La Guiche or Laguiche, de, deh lȧ gèsh, (PHILIBERT,) a French general, born about 1540. He refused to execute the order of the court for the massacre of Protestants in 1572. He commanded the artillery at Ivry, and contributed largely to the victory. Died in 1607.

His nephew, JEAN FRANÇOIS, born in 1569, was a marshal of France. Died in 1632.

Laguille, lȧ'gèl' or lȧ'ge'ye, (LOUIS,) a French Jesuit, born at Autun in 1658, wrote an "Ancient and Modern History of Alsace," (2 vols. folio, 1727.) Died in 1742.

Laguna, lȧ-goo'nȧ, or Lacuna, lȧ-koo'nȧ, (ANDRES,) a learned Spanish physician, born at Segovia in 1499. He obtained the confidence of Charles V., who appointed him physician of the army in Flanders. He practised in Metz, (1540–46,) and in Rome, where he was patronized by the pope, who made him a count. He died in Spain in 1560, leaving numerous works, among which are Commentaries on Galen and Hippocrates, and "Anatomica Methodus," (1535.)

See N. ANTONIO, "Bibliotheca Hispana Nova."

Laharpe or La Harpe, lȧ'hȧrp', (FRÉDÉRIC CÉSAR,) a Swiss officer and republican, born in the Pays de Vaud in 1754. He was for some years preceptor of Alexander, afterwards Czar of Russia, and about 1798 became the chief or most powerful director of the Helvetic Republic. He went out of power in 1800. In 1814 he enjoyed the favour of Alexander, who was in Paris and gave him the rank of general in his army. He wrote several treatises on Swiss politics. Died in 1838.

See CHARLES MONNARD, "Notice biographique sur le Général F. C. de Laharpe," 1838; "Nouvelle Biographie Générale."

La Harpe or Laharpe, de, deh lȧ'hȧrp', (JEAN FRANÇOIS,) a celebrated French critic and dramatist, born in Paris in 1739, was educated at the College of Harcourt. He produced in 1763 the tragedy of "Warwick," which was very successful, and wrote to Voltaire a letter on the dramatic art which procured him the favour and patronage of that philosopher. He composed, besides other dramas, the applauded tragedies of "Mélanie," (about 1770,) and "Philoctète." His talents found a congenial employment in academic competitions. He wrote admirable eulogies on Fénelon, Henry IV., Lafontaine, and others, and he received several prizes from the French Academy, of which he was chosen a member in 1776. About 1786 he began to lecture at the Lycée of Paris on literature. These lectures, entitled "Cours de Littérature, ancienne et moderne," (18 vols.,) constitute his most durable title to fame. His criticisms on French authors are much better than those on the ancient classics. "The seventeenth century," says Sainte-Beuve, "in some of its parts and some of its works, was never better analyzed," [than by La Harpe.] At the beginning of the French Revolution he was a republican. He was imprisoned a few months during the reign of terror. Died in 1803.
